The first of the alcohols I have enumerated, ethyl alcohol, is made from anything containing quantities of starch and sugar. Corn heads the list, yielding 75 per cent of alcohol. Potatoes yield 15 per cent, and are chiefly used in Germany. Our Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wilson, believes that a large potato will be produced here for alcohol purposes if we take the tax off denatured alcohol. As sweet potatoes, sugar canes, cassava, and sugar beets all yield alcohol, every part of the country can produce its own fuel and light. Of this ethyl alcohol the United States produced 128,623,402 proof gallons in 1902; Germany the same year produced 223,899,120 proof gallons. Of this amount Germany used 73,635,249 gallons in the arts, free of tax.

Whether or not small cooperative distilleries in farm neighborhoods would develop in this country for the production of fuel and illuminant, I am not competent to say. Such an evolution is possible and would bring with it the utilization of much of the unmarketable farm product, save transportation of the stock-feed residue from the still, and eliminate the freight charge on the raw corn to the distant distillery and the freight charge on the fuel and illuminant from the distillery to the farm. Germany has a vast number of these small distilleries. So has Belgium, but in the latter country, where distilleries putting out as little as 250 gallons per day are permitted, the small concerns have a hard struggle to live against the large distilleries and their economies. As a rule the American farmer does not divide his interest and does not manufacture, and if I should hazard a guess, I would say that the farmer will buy his fuel alcohol from an independent distiller. Of course all such distilleries will be under strict governmental supervision.

Using corn as the raw material, the average yield of alcohol from a bushel of corn is nearly 5 proof gallons, equaling 2½ gallons of absolute or pure alcohol, or 2.66 gallons testing 94 per cent. The by-products, used for feeding cattle, pay the cost of distillation. Alcohol, then, can be produced as follows: Corn, at 30 cents per bushel, would produce 94 per cent alcohol, at 11 cents; corn, at 35 cents per bushel, would produce 94 per cent alcohol, at 13 cents; corn, at 40 cents per bushel, would produce 94 per cent alcohol, at 15 cents. This would bring the estimated cost of fuel alcohol, denatured for fuel and light, to the consumer as follows:

	Cents.
Cost of grain alcohol, at, say, 14 cents per gallon	14
Cost of denaturant, at 60 cents per gallon	1½
Package and selling profit per gallon	4
Total	19½

This is a very conservative figure. No doubt it will be made at a price below that. But considering the fact that because only 2 per cent of petroleum is gasoline and by reason of the great increase in gasoline engines used this gasoline is constantly increasing in price, 20 cent alcohol, which gives twice the length of burning and is a better light than kerosene and is a cleaner and less dangerous fuel than gasoline, will occupy the field as a regulating competitor of the products of petroleum, now in rural districts a monopoly.

THE HISTORY OF KEROSENE.

This brings me to the consumption of petroleum fuel and light in this country to-day. The kerosene lamp is only fifty years old. Mr. Kier, of Pittsburg, brought the first glass chimney to America and produced the first kerosene lamp. Kier was another Whitney, another Goodyear. He made the present immense production of petroleum possible by his lamp. My father told me the other day that when he was a boy petroleum was used solely as a healing ointment and was called Seneca oil. To-day, according to the census of 1900, we use in the United States in the neighborhood of 534,000,000 gallons of kerosene annually as an illuminant. We are using about 280,000,000 gallons of gasoline of domestic production, or altogether about 800,000,000 gallons of kerosene and gasoline. My State, Kansas, uses annually 9,000,000 gallons of kerosene and 6,000,000 gallons of gasoline. This tremendous market is held by a monopoly. What will be the effect if tax-free denatured alcohol is let into this field?

USE OF ALCOHOL IN MANUFACTURES.

Those who charge us with being fanciful, to begin with, do not deny that great good will come to the manufacturers by taking the tax off denatured alcohol. They will pay a low price for an alcohol which does not injure the workmen, as wood alcohol does, where they are now paying from 70 cents to $1.50 for wood alcohol. The manufacturers who will use this product are those making aniline colors and dyes, hats (stiff, silk, and straw), electrical apparatus, transparent soap, furniture, picture moldings, burial caskets, cabinetwork, passenger cars, pianos, organs, whips, toys, rattan goods, lead pencils, brushes, wagons, boots and shoes, smokeless powder, fulminate of mercury, brass beds, gas and electric light fixtures, various kinds of metal hardware, incandescent mantles, photographic materials, celluloid and other like compounds, sulphuric ether, organic chemicals. Artificial silk, not now made in this country, will be made and will consume hundreds of thousands of bales of cotton. It is no part of the plan of this legislation to remove the tax from spirits used in patent medicines or chemicals. The fact that it will benefit the manufacturers conceded, will it benefit the farmer; and if so, how? I would answer, in three ways:

First. By increasing the market demand for corn. As we produce some 2,000,000,000 bushels of corn annually, the increased demand of some 100,000,000 bushels of corn for alcohol would not seem to have a material bearing on the price; but, nevertheless, this increased demand would come out of the surplus production, which has a disproportionate weight in reducing the price, and in years of short production this increased demand would have a greater effect on raising the price.

Second. By regulating the present erratic price of kerosene and gasoline. This would no doubt be denatured alcohol's most important function. Gasoline sells in some of the eastern cities at 9 cents a gallon; in some of the Western States at 30 cents a gallon. Kerosene has a similar range. The price is fixed arbitrarily by the Standard Oil trust. Actual tests have demonstrated that alcohol at 30 cents a gallon is cheaper than kerosene at 15 cents a gallon. Twenty-cent alcohol would drive 10-cent kerosene down in price or out of the market. For internal-combustion engines 20-cent alcohol would bring 30-cent gasoline to 20 cents, and would perhaps in time supplant it, because gasoline, apparently from natural causes, is increasing in price.

Third. By the general use of denatured alcohol for fuel, light, and power in rural districts. This brings me to a description of the alcohol light, the alcohol engine, and the alcohol refrigerator.

Mr. SIMS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. In using alcohol you avoid the unpleasant odors and fumes that you get from the use of gasoline, do you not?

Mr. MURDOCK. Absolutely; it is not foul smelling.

Mr. SIBLEY. Will the gentleman pardon me an interruption?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. SIBLEY. I did not hear the gentleman state what price alcohol could be furnished to the consumer.

Mr. MURDOCK. I have stated, but I will state it again, that at one of the Peoria distilleries from 1896 to 1905 the cost of alcohol 190 proof, or 90 above proof, averaged from 9 cents to 19 cents a gallon.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman state what was the price of corn at that time?

Mr. MURDOCK. Corn varied from 30 cents up to 65 cents a bushel.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to suggest to the gentleman that in the western part of the State, or farther west, where he and some of the rest of us live, the price of alcohol made out of corn, that is much cheaper than the price which he refers to, would reduce the cost of alcohol perceptibly.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is perfectly true, but because I have been accused of being fanciful I have tried to be conservative by taking the higher figures.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. STANLEY. Can not you produce alcohol about as good as the grain alcohol from other substances, like cornstalks, beets, refuse matter, and things of that kind, at an infinitely small price, and from useless substances that are now of no practical service to anybody?

Mr. MURDOCK. That is true, and I have left that out of consideration and dealt wholly with the corn. The residue of the sugar beets, molasses from sugar cane, cassava, yams, and Irish potatoes will all produce alcohol. Germany's alcohol, with a production of 223,000,000 gallons against our 128,000,000 gallons, is produced from potatoes.

Mr. FULKERSON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. FULKERSON. How does the power produced by gasoline compare with that produced by alcohol?

Mr. MURDOCK. I have stated that the power produced by gasoline and alcohol is about the same, with a slight advantage in favor of alcohol.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman that I am in favor of taking off the tax on alcohol in the use of the arts. One of the most beneficial things the Ways and Means Committee has done for a long time is to report this bill favorably. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Kansas that I concur in substance with the eloquent remarks the gentleman has made, and I suggest to the gentleman that he apply, in order to bring about the consummation so devoutly to be desired, to the source of all power in the House of Representatives—the Committee on Rules—and have that committee bring in a special rule to consider this bill; and I undertake to say that if the Committee on Rules will bring in such a rule for the consideration of this measure, we will be able to pass it.

Mr. MURDOCK. While, as a rule, I am against rules, for this very commendable purpose I think I should stand for the rule. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman please state the price of gasoline?

Mr. MURDOCK. The price of gasoline varies over the country. It is said that it sells here for automobile purposes for 9 cents a gallon. It sells in the West for 28 cents a gallon. There are territories in the United States in which it sells at 30 cents a gallon.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, I would state that I would like to correct the gentleman about the gasoline selling here for 9 cents a gallon. I am buying it every day in a small way. I pay 15 cents a gallon for it, and at some places they charge as high as 20 cents a gallon. At home I pay 22 cents a gallon for it in barrel lots. I have a letter here from Texas that tells me it is selling there for 30 cents a gallon.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] that the first function of denatured tax-free alcohol, in my opinion, would be to compete and as a competing regulator with gasoline and kerosene.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. I understand the gentleman to say that if we take the tax off alcohol it will be a competitor with kerosene. Is that so?

Mr. MURDOCK. That is true.

Mr. SULZER. Then of course we are to assume that the trust of all trusts—the Standard Oil trust—is opposed to taking this tax off alcohol.

Mr. MURDOCK. I should think they would be, but I was not discussing that feature of the case.

THE ALCOHOL LAMP.

Both Professor Wiley, of the Department of Agriculture, and Rufus F. Herrick, representing the American Chemical Society, exhibited alcohol lamps before the Committee on Ways and Means. The lamp Mr. Herrick showed was of French make, price about $2. The burner, which is the vital part of the lamp, costs about $1, and is interchangeable with any ordinary kerosene burner. It is a vapor light. The alcohol is drawn up by capillary attraction to a point where it comes to a tube which has a hair-like orifice, which, being warmed, converts the alcohol into vapor, and which then rises through a perforated plate and by the white heat of the mantle is turned into gas. The resulting light is very brilliant, but can be regulated. It is clean and safe. Speaking of the lamp in comparison with kerosene lamps, Mr. Herrick said:

> I want to refer, in connection with this lamp, to the report made by the Electrical Testing Laboratories in New York City, and to state that 1 gallon of alcohol burned fifty-eight hours and fifty-two minutes, the candlepower of the lamp being twenty-five and the candlepower hours being one thousand four hundred and seventy-one. In a lamp burning kerosene 1 gallon lasted eighty-seven hours, the candlepower of the lamp being nine and the candlepower hours being seven hundred and eighty-three.
> The report is signed by the Electrical Testing Laboratories, by Preston D. Miller. I submit that this report shows that if we had two lamps of equal capacity, one burning alcohol and the other kerosene, the alcohol lamp would burn nearly twice as long as the kerosene lamp. I have read a report of experiments conducted for an extended period by Professor Rosseau, of the University of Brussels, Belgium, in which careful photometric tests were made of both alcohol and kerosene burning lights. This report showed that for lighting purposes alcohol costing 31 cents per gallon is slightly cheaper that kerosene costing 15 cents a gallon.

These lights are used in Germany and France. The Emperor's palace in Berlin is lighted with alcohol. No one claims that the alcohol lamp will entirely supplant the kerosense lamp, but it will become its rival in time.

THE ALCOHOL ENGINE.

Prefatory to a statement on the use of alcohol for power, something is to be said about the conquering march of the internal-combustion engine through the land. Light in weight, small in size, easy to start, requiring a minimum of attendance while in operation, it is everywhere bringing new economies, is everywhere making the sweat of industry's brow a poetical figure of speech. Its irregular snort, its asthmatic cough is abroad in the land, and as the walls of Jericho crumbled at Joshua's horn, so, at its sound, the back-breaking, arm-wearying, brain-benumbing hardships of small shop and farm are vanishing. It turns the weekly newspaper press, the town feed mill, the sausage grinder of the local butcher, the lathe of the village blacksmith, the belts of the local elevator, and in some sections it bales the farmer's hay, shells his corn, shreds the fodder, pumps the water, separates the cream, saws the wood, and last, but not least, it is marching on to the emancipation of a boyhood whose leisure has been absorbed for two centuries by taking the boy's unhappy place at the grindstone and the churn. It has marched on over obstacles, despite the fact that gasoline is dangerous; that water will not put it out; that fire insurance companies frown upon its use, despite the fact that the price of gasoline is in many places high; that it is generally increasing, and that the quality of gasoline varies, and despite the fact that gasoline is unclean and foul-smelling.

Give denatured alcohol a chance, and the conquest of the internal-combustion engine will duplicate in America General Miles' exploit in Porto Rico.

In an internal-combustion alcohol engine the alcohol vapor and air are compressed in the cylinder by the piston on the return stroke, an electric spark explodes the vapor, and transmits the power by the shaft to the engine. According to the testimony of J. C. Warnes, representing the International Harvester Company, of Chicago, most of the engines in present use can, with slight expense, be converted into alcohol engines.

Compared with gasoline, the use of denatured alcohol shows many advantages. Mr. Warnes, mentioned above, said in his testimony:

Alcohol is a suitable fuel for explosive engines; in fact it is the ideal fuel, because of its unlimited and universal source, and because of its uniform quality. Its physical properties peculiarly adapt it to economical conversion into power in the combustion chamber of an explosive engine.

Alcohol will mix with water. It has a greater capacity to absorb heat and a lower flash point than gasoline, thus preserving a more uniform temperature, and in consequence less loss by radiation, and also permitting a higher compression. Roughly speaking, alcohol possesses only half as many heat units per volume as gasoline, but, on the other hand, its thermal efficiency is twice as great, so that equal volumes will produce equal results in power. It is not so much a question of the heat units in the substance as how many of the heat units can be converted into useful work.

Prof. Elihu Thomson, of the General Electric Company, speaking of denatured alcohol as a motor fuel, said:

It may be mentioned here that our experiments developed the fact that alcohol is suitable as a motor fuel even when it contains as high a percentage as 15 per cent of water. Notwithstanding the heating value of alcohol, or the number of heat units contained is much less than that in gasoline, it is found by actual experiment that a gallon of alcohol will develop substantially the same power in an internal combustion engine as a gallon of gasoline.

This is owing to the superior efficiency of operation when alcohol is used. Less of the heat is thrown away in waste gases and in the water jacket. The mixture of alcohol vapor with air stands a much higher compression than does gasoline and air without premature explosion, and this is one of the main factors in giving a greater efficiency. It follows from this that, with alcohol at the same price as gasoline, the amount of power developed and the cost of the power will be relatively the same so far as fuel itself is concerned, but on account of the higher efficiency of the alcohol less cooling water is required, or a less percentage of the heat of combustion is communicated to the cylinder walls of the engine. The exhaust gases from the alcohol engine carry off less heat. They are cooler gases.

Leonard B. Goebbels, representing the Otto Gas Engine Works, of Philadelphia, said, before the Ways and Means Committee:

The thermal efficiency—that is, the degree of utilizing all of the heating value—of alcohol is much greater than that of gasoline, the figures being about 21 per cent for gasoline as against 30 per cent or more for alcohol. The consumption of alcohol per horsepower I found to be practically the same in volume as it was when using gasoline—that is, about one-eighth of 1 United States gallon per hour.

The Paris Journal Revue Technique recently published a series of reports from chemists showing the comparative efficiencies to be as follows:

	Per cent.
Gasoline	20
Alcohol	33
Alcohol with 10 per cent water	38

It is noteworthy that alcohol diluted 10 per cent with water is increased thereby in efficiency over 10 per cent.

In the matter of danger from fire, alcohol has every superiority over gasoline. Water spreads gasoline. It puts alcohol fire out. Professor Thomson, whom I have just quoted, said:

Gasoline is more volatile than alcohol, having a much lower boiling point, and is therefore proportionately more dangerous, especially in warm weather. The flame of burning gasoline is a highly luminous flame, one which radiates heat rapidly, whereas the alcohol flame is a faint blue or an almost nonluminous flame, which does not radiate heat to any great extent. The consequence of this is that a mass of burning gasoline will radiate sufficient heat to set fire to things at a distance from it, while heat from burning alcohol goes upward, mostly in the hot gases which rise from the flame.

Of the vast number of alcohol engines which would be made there is ample evidence. Although the alcohol engine was not perfected in Germany until 1900, and although with the small-sized farms there the demand is slight, there are 6,000 alcohol engines now in use. One central station in Berlin in 1903 had contracts for supplying 1,011 alcohol engines, of which 544 were intended for agricultural purposes. James S. Capen, representing the Detroit Board of Commerce, says there are now under contract in and about Detroit engines which will require 200,000 gallons of gasoline or alcohol per day, or 60,000,000 gallons a year—practically as much as Germany consumes of industrial alcohol altogether. And Mr. Capen added that the question of the manufacturers of the country to-day is not so much one of cost as it is a question of absolute supply of burning material. Mr. Warnes, whom I have quoted, said:

There is little doubt but the amount of denatured alcohol used for power and lighting purposes alone would far exceed the aggregate amount used for all other purposes.

He estimated that 100,000 stationary engines a year would be put out. He offered the large number of gasoline engines in use at present as an explanation of the cause of the rapidly advancing price of gasoline.

In concluding in the matter of alcohol as a power, I will submit for your consideration the following from a consular report:

ALCOHOL MOTORS AND PUMPS IN CUBA.

[From United States Minister Squiers, Habana, Cuba.]

Matanzas, a city of about 40,000 inhabitants, has water connection in 1,700 out of 4,000 houses, which use about 100,000 gallons a day. The waterworks, operated by an American company incorporated in the State of Delaware, are located a few miles distant from the city, where there are springs giving excellent water in sufficient quantity to supply a city of 100,000 people.

The alcohol motor pump, used on Sunday last for the first time, is of German manufacture, and cost, complete with installation, $6,000. This motor pump is a 45-horsepower machine and is operated at a fuel cost of about 40 cents an hour, or $4 a day of ten hours, pumping 1,000,000 gallons of water.

As alcohol here is very cheap (10 cents a gallon) the running expenses of these motors are at the minimum. The Germans are selling in Cuba many such motors for electric-lighting and water plants at very low prices. One firm has a contract to put in an alcohol motor pump at Vento, for use in connection with the Habana water supply, which is expected to develop 180 horsepower, to cost, with installation, about $25,000, and to pump 1,000,000 gallons an hour at a fuel cost of $1.60. The same firm has installed an electric-plant alcohol motor of 45 horsepower, which supplies 138 lights (Hersh lamps) at a fuel cost of 5 cents an hour.

I call the attention of those who are interested in our Cuban trade to the fact that at the breakfast which followed the installation there was not one article on the table of American origin except the flour in the bread.

H. G. SQUIERS, Minister.

HABANA, CUBA, August 20, 1904.

COOKING, HEATING, AND REFRIGERATION.

Denatured alcohol can be used for cooking. It can also operate a portable heating stove. There are about 800,000 gasoline stoves and heaters in this country. The alcohol heaters in Germany range in price from $8.40 to $11.50. One of the convenient novelties largely used in Germany is an alcohol flatiron with a small reservoir, which, being filled with alcohol and lighted, heats the iron for the hour's work at less than 2 cents.

One of the things the farmers need is means of refrigeration. Denatured alcohol may bring that. Professor Wiley, speaking of ethyl—that is, grain alcohol—said: "When you introduce into ethyl a molecule of chlorine you make ethyl chloride, which is not a beverage and which is impossible to drink, but which is a great refrigerant and could be used by the farmer for domestic refrigeration at much less expense than anhydrous ammonia, which is the common refrigerating agent." There is a machine in existence for the utilization of this ethyl chloride, waiting for the emancipation of denatured alcohol.

THE THREE OBJECTIONS.

It has been said that the progress with denatured alcohol in England has not been such as to encourage us. But England made the mistake of placing the amount of denaturant to be used too high and of burdening the industry with an excessive supervision. It is now in process of correcting its mistake. Besides England is not agricultural as we understand agriculture. Conditions in neither England nor Germany constitute in any manner an index of what can be done in America. There are in Germany 1,000,000 farms of less than 3 acres each. Our farms are estates. Our corn production is two and a quarter billion bushels annually, and 75 per cent of corn is alcohol. Most of our soil is new, and with the proper variety of potatoes, our production in tubers would far surpass that of any country in Europe.

We are a people who adapt ourselves to innovations readily. The tax on denatured alcohol in the industries has held American ingenuity, so marvelous in all other lines, in check in this. Cut the bond, and no man can estimate the uses, in number and kind, to which America would put denatured alcohol. For instance, in the western part of my State are the high plains, of unsurpassed fertility of soil and with an abundance of water beneath. Cheap fuel will raise this water for the irrigation of the uplands. It was need of cheap fuel in this regard which first attracted my attention to denatured alcohol.

Against tax-free denatured alcohol three specific arguments have been made. I will treat of them briefly, because you have heard them answered at length in the able and exhaustive speech by Mr. MARSHALL, of North Dakota.

The first of the objections is embodied in the fear that it would be possible to recover by fraud the drinkable alcohol from the denatured alcohol. While this might be done, it has been amply demonstrated by Professor Wiley and others that it will not be done. To separate the alcohol and the denaturant many redistillations, requiring the use of costly apparatus, would be necessary. Expert witnesses agree that it would be cheaper to make the alcohol from grain and pay the high tax on it than to redistill it out of the denatured alcohol. This has been so completely proved that the temperance advocates are generally favoring the measure, and several appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means in its behalf. The reported bill provides a severe penalty for attempts at recovery.

The second objection is the possible impairment of the nation's revenues. About 8,000,000 gallons of taxable grain alcohol were used in the industries in 1890, this being an estimate, no record being kept. At that time about 1,000,000 gallons of wood alcohol, untaxed, were produced. Now, about 8,000,000 gallons of wood alcohol, untaxed, are produced for domestic use, and because this wood alcohol is cheaper than the taxed grain alcohol, the wood alcohol has largely crowded the grain alcohol out of manufactures. As the Commissioner of Internal Revenue keeps no separate record of the grain alcohol used in the industries, no exact figures are available, but a careful estimate by Mr. Klein, of the Philadelphia Trades League, indicates that we would lose less than $500,000 in revenue annually by taking the tax off denatured alcohol. Secretary Shaw, of the Treasury, says that for so great an enterprise we can stand the cut.

The third objection deals with the harmful effect of this legislation on the wood-alcohol business. Wood alcohol pays no tax. It is protected by a customs tariff. Its selling price is arbitrarily fixed through a combination. The contracts made for the purchase of the crude product are expressly voidable in event of such legislation as this, which has been expected for years. Will denatured alcohol drive wood alcohol out of the manufactures? To a large extent, yes; because denatured alcohol is better, less harmful to the workmen, and without the tax will be cheaper. Will the wood-alcohol industry be ruined? I think not. It is made as a by-product of other profitable articles. It is generally used as a denaturant and therefore if denatured alcohol comes into general use for fuel, light, and power the consumption of wood alcohol will increase. The bill reported leaves the amount of denaturant to be used and the kind to the decision of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. If he fixes the amount of denaturant too high per gallon, the use of denatured alcohol for fuel, light, and power will grow more slowly because of the high price of the denaturant. In that event the wood-alcohol industry will suffer.

THE CAMP OF DISBELIEF.

In 1860 this country produced 90,000,000 gallons of alcohol. This was before the tax went on. David A. Wells, special commissioner, reported to the Fifty-third Congress that in his opinion 33 per cent of the whole product, prior to the imposition of any taxes on alcohol, was consumed in the arts and industries. Consequently, with a population of 30,000,000 in 1860, we used industrially and for fuel and light 30,000,00 gallons—that is, 1 gallon per capita. The same proportion to-day, leaving out of consideration new uses, new inventions, and improved methods, would bring our consumption of denatured alcohol up to 75,000,000 gallons annually.

Who doubts that it will be more? For myself, I am chiefly interested in it because it will, I believe, bring to the farmers of the prairie West a better, cleaner light than kerosene, safer, cleaner fuel than gasoline, and in many sections at a lower price. And it may bring other comforts and conveniences.

The highest economic condition in the world is found in the occupying owner of a fair-sized farm. The life that is environed in stone and steel is one of uncompromising rivalry. In a city one man's success is often built on his neighbor's bankruptcy. On the farm success comes without harm to anybody, and usually with advantage to all. We have added, through invention and legislation, many creature comforts to the farm. Invention has given implements and the telephone; science, seed selection and soil cultivation; legislation, a daily mail and daily markets.

We do not know, we can not know, how far the use of denatured alcohol on the farm would reach. But in the matter there are two camps to choose between.

One is the camp of belief, of acceptance and encouragement and adoption of innovation; of hope for less labor in the world and greater comfort; of less moil and toil and more leisure; of ambitious reach into the dark for the bounties of the future.

The other is the camp of incredulity, where the disbeliever dwells with the ghosts of the men who opposed Stephenson's locomotive because the sparks from the smokestack would frighten the cattle at night; with the ghosts of the men who ridiculed the telephone as a toy; with the ghosts of the men who, within five years, opposed rural mail delivery as an "experiment;" with the ghost of that august member of the Cabinet who walked down Pennsylvania avenue with Professor Morse the morning Morse was to test the first telegraph wire in the world, between here and Baltimore—the Cabinet minister who was as great in his day as any man here is great in his day—the member of the Cabinet who stopped Professor Morse in the midst of his explanation and asked, with an air of polite concern, "How large a bundle, Mr. Morse, will this telegraph of yours carry from Baltimore to Washington?" [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. McGAVIN. Mr. Chairman, I hoped that I might be spared the necessity of inflicting myself upon the House at this session, but as this bill involves a question in which the people of Chicago are particularly interested, I consider it my duty to say a word.

In my desire to do something to relieve the situation in Chicago I introduced a bill in this House for the erection of a post-office building on the West Side of the city. It was not my intention to make it a sectional question there, but simply to carry out a plan which I believe to be a good one, namely, the erection of a building near the union depot, through which passes about 50 per cent of Chicago's mail. The scheme would have the further virtues of being near the great retail district of the South Side, be more convenient to the great mail-order houses on the West Side, and at the same time be away from the congested portion of the city, where the ingress and egress are interfered with by the great number of vehicles and street cars which constantly pass along the busy streets surrounding the present post-office, and which is one of the numerous handicaps of that building.

But, Mr. Chairman, when we make a proposition of this kind we are told that Chicago just had a new post-office building. That statement is partially true. We have a Government building which, I understand, houses about sixty departments of the Government—the post-office occupying the lower floors, the mailing division being in the basement and reached by means of a driveway declining from one street through the center of the building, then up to the street on the opposite side. But it did not occur to the contractors, it seems, that it would also be necessary to get out, and now in rainy or slippery weather it is impossible for teams to draw the wagons out of that driveway, and consequently they are blocked and the mails delayed. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that it was not until the building was completed in other respects that it occurred to the parties in charge that no mail chutes had been put in. They seemed to have entirely forgotten that they were building a post-office. This building is a dream of architectural beauty, but not a respectable apology for a post-office.

The exigencies of the times demand that public buildings be built for utility rather than for beauty, for business rather than for political purposes. It seems to be the consensus of the opinion of experts that in large cities post-offices should be built exclusively for post-office purposes. In the old temporary post-office at Chicago, a building two stories high and situated away from the congested part of the city, our department was well housed, the mails handled conveniently, and the work was much lighter on the employees. But to-day all this is changed. The mails are frequently delayed from twelve to twenty-four hours, and the rooms are dark and congested, and the work almost unbearable. The men in the mailing division of the Chicago post-office, I understand, average about eleven hours per day, and theirs is the hardest kind of work. These are conditions that should not and would not be tolerated by the employees of a private corporation, and which would not exist in Chicago to-day if her post-office department got what it is properly entitled to. And this brings me up to an incident to which I desire to give a passing notice. After the urgent deficiency bill had passed this House and before it had reached the Senate, Postmaster Busse, of Chicago, came down to Washington post haste and asked Congress to make an increase in the allowance for Chicago. An amendment was inserted appropriating an additional $60,000, and that amendment was concurred in by the House. Chicago wanted 225 clerks. She got 75, and the money for the hiring of the balance seems to have been diverted to other channels. Congress is not to blame for the way the money was used, except because of the rule which prohibits the express statement as to what purposes the money is for. I want to know if that is our idea of right. I want to know if Congress has no control over the money after it is appropriated, and if its expenditure is left entirely in the discretion of the Department; and if that is true, what assurances we have that the money we now appropriate will be used for the purposes for which it was intended? The $60,000 referred to having been appropriated at the instance of the Chicago postmaster, there could have been no question of what the intention of Congress was, no more than there could be if it had been expressly stated in the bill.

Mr. Chairman, where a private individual or corporation has a large dividend-paying establishment and numerous smaller nonself-supporting ones, instead of spending large sums of money on the smaller ones, it extends the larger one and increases its force, and consequently its output. This should be, though it seems it is not, the policy of the Government. With one year's net revenue from the Chicago post-office the Government could provide for Chicago in post-office facilities for the present generation at least.

Doing a larger business than all the Presidential offices in the State of Pennsylvania; a larger business than all the Presidential offices in the States of Ohio and Indiana combined; more than the entire business of the cities of Philadelphia, Boston, Brooklyn, and St. Louis, in view of the immense amount of money that has been expended in these places, it seems to me that our requests are not unreasonable.

But Chicago is not suffering from a lack of facilities alone. It has been for some time suffering from a lack of help. I have called your attention to the manner in which Chicago was treated in the matter of the appropriation in the urgent deficiency bill, and I would here like to call to the attention of the House two letters, dated February 5, addressed to Mr. Fred A. Busse, postmaster, Chicago, Ill., and signed by F. H. Galbraith, superintendent of mails of the Chicago post-office, which read as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., February 5, 1906.

Mr. FRED A. BUSSE,
Postmaster, Chicago, Ill.

SIR: In compliance with departmental instructions, fifty-five temporary clerks were dropped from the rolls of this office on Thursday, February 1, 1906. Three working days and one Sunday have passed since this curtailment of the force was made effective, and while you have received a daily report on the subject, yet I attach hereto a copy of each one of these reports in order that they may serve again to remind all concerned of the miserable kind of service we have been giving the patrons of this office during the past few days. It goes without saying that every letter, daily paper, market report, and, in fact, all matter mailed at this office should be forwarded by the first available train. However, it is now apparent to the local post-office officials that the business can not be properly handled unless we are provided with ample facilities, which, of course, includes an increase in the clerical force.

The conditions are such in the building which we are now occupying that it requires at least 150 more men to handle the business than it requires in the old quarters on the lake front. This addition to the force is absolutely necessary in order to enable us to handle in the same length of time the same quantity of mail that was handled in the old building. Nevertheless the working force has not been increased to meet the changed conditions, and, furthermore, there has in the meantime been an enormous increase in the volume of business handled. The quantity of mail handled at this office has increased fully 15 per cent during the past year, and although we have moved into a building that requires extra labor in handling the mails, yet we have no emergency fund on hand with which to employ temporary clerks, while one year ago from forty to sixty-five temporary men were employed daily.

At the present time the men are very much discouraged because of the long hours of duty. This condition is serious, but even more serious is the improper manner in which the public business is being handled in this office. It is a question as to how long the clerical force and the patrons of this office will tolerate such conditions. The clerks are tendering their resignations at an unheard-of rate, 118 having been received during the past three months. The business men of this city have made many complaints relative to delays in dispatch of their mail, but with a few more days' experience such as we have had since the first of this month the complaints will, without doubt, exceed anything we have known before.

As stated many times within the past few weeks, both verbally and in writing, it will not be possible to give the people of this city the service to which they are entitled unless the clerical force in this office is increased by the permanent appointment of at least 200 additional clerks.

Respectfully,

F. H. GALBRAITH,
Superintendent of Mails.

CHICAGO, ILL., February 5, 1906.

Hon. FRED A. BUSSE,
Postmaster, Chicago, Ill.

SIR: You are well aware of the fact that the conditions in the new post-office building are adverse, and that we are confronted on every side with the necessity for more men than were necessary to perform the work at the temporary building on the lake front. The machinery is frequently out of order; breakdowns and clogged chutes make it necessary to take men from their regular assignments and put them to work trucking mails. For example, when conveyor No. 11 breaks down, or when it has insufficient capacity, large quantities of mail must be trucked from the north end of platform to the elevator at south end, where they are raised two floors and then trucked to the north side of the building through narrow aisles which at times are badly crowded with trucks moving in the opposite directions, a total distance covered by truckers of nearly a quarter of a mile.

The force of laborers were employed in one section in the old building, and they were therefore able to work together to good advantage. In the new building this force is divided on conveyors Nos. 4, 5, 6, 9, and 11, and divided again for the reason that attention must be given these conveyors in the basement as well as on the second floor. The same thing in a lesser degree applies to the numerous chutes, and they are at times out of working order. The cases are spread out shoestring fashion around the oufer edge of a wall 1,340 feet in length, and the trucking required on second floor is now a good big job, requiring the services of many more laborers than in the old building. The bag room is located in such an out-of-the-way place that it requires a great deal of trucking to handle the immense quantity of surplus and defective equipment turned in here from a dozen neighboring States.

We have been compelled to get along without proper light in many places, and also to do considerable janitor and carpenter work where it was an absolute necessity. The platform and driveway facilities are abominable, and in order to handle the business it has not only been necessary to divide the platform force by sending men over to Station U, and others under and over the Dearborn street sidewalk and also at entrance and exit to the driveway, but it has also been necessary to assign a large number of additional men to the platform proper. In fact, many of the various mechanical devices, while absolutely necessary, are not labor savers in any sense of the word; instead, they require many men to care for them and to operate them as planned.

The long distances, the lack of means of communication, the frequently recurring makeshifts made necessary by stoppages of machinery all contribute to our embarrassment. To summarize the situation, will say that with the same amount of work to be performed in the same period of time conditions are such in the mailing division as to make necessary the employment of at least 150 more men than were required in the old building.

The mails have increased about 15 per cent during the past year, and this in itself, without considering the handicap in the new building, should give the mailing division about 7 per cent increase in the force, or about 65 men. This added to the number of additional clerks needed because of changed conditions make a total of 215 men, and I am certain that even that addition to the clerical force will not decrease the time of working schedules to an eight-hour basis after the 1st of March, when the advertising rush will begin.

All told, not less than 200 clerks should be provided at once; otherwise it will not be possible to give the patrons of this office the prompt and efficient service to which they are entitled.

Respectfully,

F. H. GALBRAITH,
Superintendent of Mails.

Commenting upon the situation in Chicago, Mr. Chairman, the Chicago Record, in an editorial in its issue of February 7, says:

CONGRESS'S CONCERN WITH LETTERS FROM CHICAGO.

It is an unfortunate truth that Congress can never keep up with the Chicago pace. Congress is usually able to comprehend how much mail goes through the Chicago post-office about three years too late. It usually gives the postmaster the number of clerks he ought to have had several years before. It would be wiser if it gave him the number of clerks he will need a year or two in advance.

The results are serious. Clerks are brutally overworked. Mail matter is seriously delayed. The postmaster is compelled to spend time traveling back and forth between Chicago and Washington in a vain endeavor to get the wherewithal to do his work, when he ought to be free to stay here and direct the work on the spot.

Just at present the Chicago post-office is again suffering from an acute attack of shorthandedness. Last Friday the overtime of the staff of 709 clerks and laborers engaged in handling the mails was equivalent to the labor of 234 men for eight hours each. On that day 205,900 letters missed mail trains they should have reached for the sole reason that the post-office did not have human hands enough to handle them. Such facts are the strongest of arguments for a provision of more cash and more men.

Much is said these days about the relation of business to politics. In this post-office matter not enough is said. Business should be given the mail facilities it needs. Politics should be on the keen watch to make those facilities ample.

The need in this case is not a mere Chicago need. Every letter has its point of destination as well as its point of origin. Delay in the Chicago post-office does a total injury of which Chicago by itself suffers only one-half. Every Member of Congress has constituents every day who suffer from the Chicago blockade.

There must be some way by which Congress can provide the additional employees who are immediately needed. That way should be found and acted upon before the evil grows worse.

Similar commentations have been made by the other newspapers of Chicago.

The question has been asked numerous times as to who is responsible for the conditions which prevail in Chicago, and it is usually sought to shoulder a great deal of the responsibility upon the architect and the contractors. They may be in a measure responsible, but there are also other causes. The present post-office in Chicago having been begun in 1897, following the panic of the immediate preceding years, it was impossible for the Treasury Department or the contractors to anticipate the great prosperity that was to come so soon to this country. It was just as impossible for them to foresee the enormous increase in the post-office business of Chicago as it was for you and I, Mr. Chairman, to even harbor a thought that out of the black night of business chaos and disaster should rise the sun of prosperity, more radiant in her beauty, more magnificent in her splendor, and more constant in her devotion than she had ever been since her amorous lips first kissed the cheek of this blushing young Republic. [Applause on the Republican side.] And right here, Mr. Chairman, I might say a word in reply to the argument made by my colleague the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], in his debate this morning, commenting upon the question of the tariff on watches. It was brought out by a question from the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] that the Democratic party were not as sincere in their desire for tariff revision when in office as they were when out of office, and this was shown by producing the schedule which existed under the Wilson bill, which proved that it was 25 per cent ad valorem—practically the same as now. No gentleman on the other side would rise in defense of that Wilson tariff schedule, and it remains for me, Mr. Chairman, as a Republican, though not as a strict stand-patter, to defend it by saying that it did no one in this country any harm. People were not buying watches in those days. Everybody had plenty of time. [Laughter and applause.] Even the keenest appetite, fortified by the most perfect digestive organs, would fail to appreciate a metal salad in the form of a Waltham watch as a fitting substitute for beefsteak and bread. [Laughter and applause.] It is a custom, Mr. Chairman, of the gentlemen upon this side of the House to charge to the Republican party all the joys that this country has experienced since the passage of the Dingley tariff act. If that is true, then I want to hold them responsible for one thing, which may or may not be to their credit, for I believe that the Dingley tariff bill is in a measure responsible for the present intolerable conditions in the Chicago post-office, for had it not been for this measure the business would probably never have increased as it did, from $5,000,000 to $12,000,000 during the construction of the present building. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, in behalf of the post-office department at Chicago, the newspapers, the business men, and, above all, the men upon whose shoulders falls the heavy work, I ask that Chicago be given that consideration which she so justly deserves. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CURTIS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5521. An act to authorize the Tyronza Central Railroad Company to construct a bridge across Little River, in the State of Arkansas; and

S. 5438. An act to establish a light and fog signal in New York Bay at the entrance to the dredged channel at Greenville, N. J.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 87) providing for the withdrawal from public entry of lands needed for town-site purposes in connection with irrigation projects under the reclamation act of June 17, 1902, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 12286. An act granting relief to the estate of James Staley, deceased.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee to consume some of his time now.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield one hour to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, there are several matters connected with postal affairs that I would be glad to discuss, but I feel impelled to devote the time allotted to me in discussing the item in the bill designated, I believe, by officials as the "special-facility" appropriation, but commonly known as the "subsidy." I could have contented myself with voting against this item without giving the reasons of my opposition if prominent citizens and influential business organizations had not been more than usually active in urging my support of it. In former years, when I received resolutions from city officials, boards of trade, manufacturers' clubs, or chambers of commerce favoring it, and by letter replied to them that I had investigated the matter and considered it unwise, unnecessary, and contrary to just principles, I was permitted to vote in accordance with my judgment, with no unkind criticism from my constituents, so far as reached my ears, except from the adherents of my political opponent in the campaign of 1902. I knew, of course, that my position was not satisfactory to the companies into whose coffers this money went and that my votes had incurred their disapproval.

But, Mr. Chairman, this year I have received so many resolutions and letters, many of them from my own district and some of them expressing a desire to know the grounds of my opposition, that a respect for their opinions, a desire for their good will, and a hope for their approval require me to consume this time upon this subject.

It may be, Mr. Chairman, that had I hesitated to discuss this matter it would have been attributed to, if not justified by, a very natural disposition—an unwillingness to become a target for the assaults of the demagogue. When I recall that the main line of the Southern Railway, the chief beneficiary of this appropriation, runs through the district that honors me, and that this company operates in every one of its counties, having more than 350 miles of line in operation in the district, and think of the demagogic charge which will be repeated against me this year if my party shall again nominate me, that I have "voted against helping a southern enterprise," that I have "opposed the interests of my constituents," I would shudder for my political fate if I did not have confidence in the integrity and intelligence of the people. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, due consideration should always be given to the resolutions received from his constituents by a Representative. If he should believe that such resolutions represent the judgment of a majority of those who sent him here, and that such majority with full information wishes to instruct him how to vote, it would at once become his duty to comply with them or resign. No such condition confronts me. I am satisfied that to-day the overwhelming majority of my constituents are not in favor of this "subsidy," and that upon a full understanding of the facts and principles involved not 500 Democrats could be found within the entire district who would advise me to support it. I believe that a majority of the members of the very organizations which have communicated with me would approve my position. This is no reflection upon them, but a compliment to their candor.

Busily engaged as they are in developing the resources and contributing to the wonderful progress of the South; their energies devoted to occupations and pursuits which limit their time for research and consideration upon the manifold questions of legislation upon which, from one influence or another, they are called upon to express themselves; the information furnished them so frequently being given by interested parties and upon one side only of a proposition; their lack of direct responsibility for the legislative action, relying, as they so often do, upon the judgment of those whom they have chosen to represent them and who, on account of having the time to more thoroughly investigate such questions and the opportunity of hearing both sides, are in a better position to reach the right conclusion—all these tend to secure the passage of resolutions by such organizations without a thorough knowledge of the facts and a full consideration of the principles at stake and without that care and deliberation which they would exercise before requesting their city council to institute an important enterprise. As an illustration, the head of one of the most prominent business organizations in my State, a gentleman of ability and accuracy, who forwarded to me the resolutions of his organization in favor of this item, in reply to a letter from me asking the reasons for thinking his city would be deprived of adequate mail facilities in case of the defeat of this item, stated that he delayed answering until he "could make some investigation and answer more intelligently," plainly indicating, it seemed to me, that sufficient investigation had not been given the matter prior to the passage of the resolutions. Frequently, however, such resolutions are of the soundest principles and of the highest merit. I give all resolutions consideration and am always glad to receive them, and especially from my constituents, but when one reaches me upon which I have reason to think my information is wider and more accurate and whose underlying principle I can not indorse, I shall adhere to my own judgment in the matter.

The items which I am now opposing read as follows:

For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Washington to Atlanta and New Orleans, $142,728.75: Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

For continuing necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Kansas City, Mo., to Newton, Kans., $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

Under the regular pay, exclusive of the subsidy, the trunk lines from Washington to New Orleans, for transportation and cars, receive from the Government the sum of $1,227,437.09.

It seems no one can speak for this special appropriation without relying upon the provisions apparently placing it in the discretion of the Postmaster-General. As to this let us see how the Department regards it. It puts the entire responsibility on Congress, where it really belongs. (Page 339 of last hearings.) In this House on April 26, 1900, the Assistant Postmaster-General's testimony on this point was quoted as follows:

Although on its face it appears to be a discretionary power, yet when Congress, after full debate year after year, has put this provision in the bill and made the appropriation, the Post-Office authorities can not construe it otherwise than as indicating the wish of Congress that it shall be spent, and have understood it as mandatory.

On the same day the Postmaster-General's testimony touching it was quoted as follows:

Well, the Department would have power to withhold it, but having recommended to Congress the advisability of withholding it, the Department is bound to assume that Congress desires the appropriation to be expended so long as it is made.

In the hearing this year, on page 323, the Assistant Postmaster-General says:

We still adhere to the policy of not recommending or estimating for any special facility service anywhere in the country.

And he adds, however, that if Congress appropriates they will continue to use it to the best advantage. So without doubt the Department, regardless of the provisions attached to the appropriation, considers it mandatory on it to expend it. When the money is appropriated how can you expect a Department official to withhold it from the railroads? Congress expects them to get it. Do you think Congress would appropriate this subsidy if it did not want the railroads to have it? Certainly not. No man votes for it unless he wants the railroads to get it, and this is the view the Department must take of it. If a gentleman here votes for it who does not want the railroad companies to get it, I would be glad to hear him say so.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see how the Department stands on the policy of granting this appropriation. I quote the following from Postmaster-General Wanamaker before this appropriation was made to the lines from here to New Orleans and insist that his statements are just as sound now as then and apply with equal force to this appropriation:

I believe the granting to a few and refusing to extend like compensation to the many who are performing as good or better mail schedules is a source of injury to the mail service. The preferential method should cease or all who expedite the mails should be granted the same benefit. (His report for year ending June 30, 1902.)

In his letter of date February 25, 1892, to the committee, he said:

I do not believe there exists occasion for perpetuating the preferential method whereby a limited number would be paid both ordinary and special transportation and full car compensation, while other railroads performing precisely the same character of service can be allowed nothing more than the compensation which we are by statute permitted to pay for ordinary transportation.

Again, he says:

When the special facility payments were first started it was well understood that they were but temporary, so as to bridge over a period until the natural growth of the mails would yield sufficient compensation to do away with occasion for additional compensation.

He further said—and this was long before the Southern was subsidized:

The distance from Washington to New Orleans via Atlanta is 1,143 miles. The time for the most important mail train averages 35 miles per hour.

Mr. Chairman, one of the subsidized trains to which I will again refer now, fourteen years later, with all the incidental improvements during that time, averages less than 35 miles an hour. From the days of Mr. Wanamaker till now not one Postmaster-General has ever recommended this appropriation. The present officials do not favor it. General Shallenberger does not recommend it or estimate for it. He says in the hearings:

We would estimate if we desired it.
We are not asking it, nor expressing opinions in reference to it.
I have not said I think it ought to be retained.

He further said:

I think for the good of the service at large it is better that no special favors be given to any particular road or system.

But, Mr. Chairman, one of the most direct recommendations against this appropriation is found on page 9 of Postmaster-General Cortelyou's last report. He says:

Curtailment has been recommended wherever possible, and many decreases are shown, of which the following are examples: Railway transportation, special facilities, $167,728.75.

Thus he names these two items together as the first example of those which he recommends to be omitted from this bill.

They are alike in principle, and as the fate of the smaller appropriation doubtless will follow the larger, I shall confine my discussion to the larger one. Since no Postmaster-General has ever recommended this appropriation, since for more than a dozen years it has been omitted from the estimates of the Department submitted to this body, the burden of sustaining it properly belongs to those who advocate it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BLACKBURN. What was the result of the investigation of the committee as to the difference in time?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I am going to discuss the time. I think I have given this matter full investigation, and if the gentleman will listen I think I can show him he ought to vote against these items. Let us consider the reasons given in its support, both in this House and elsewhere; and as I proceed if I should state any fact that anyone has reason to think incorrect, I would be glad to have my attention called to it. So far as I can recall, no reason is now given that has not been given for a dozen years. Every argument made in behalf of its continuation now, when Nos. 37 and 97 get the appropriation, were given years ago, when No. 35 got part of it, and I challenge its advocates to give a new reason.

The same sweeping assertions of its great accomplishments, and direful predictions of inadequate facilities in case this appropriation was discontinued, were made long before No. 97 was created. We were told that without this appropriation No. 35 could not run. To-day No. 35 does not get a dollar of it, but it runs, and runs under the advertised name of the "United States Fast Mail." The record is full of fears and declarations that without special recognition on the part of the Government the so-called extraordinary service which was given before No. 97 was heard of, and of which No. 35 was the main train, could not possibly be maintained. We heard the same arguments three or four years ago about the subsidy from New York to this city, and in fact then the stress was put on the New York train and the necessity for a subsidy for it. The subsidy was discontinued from New York to this place, and now we have a better schedule than then. Mr. Chairman, once we had subsidies from New York to Springfield, from New York to Albany, from Baltimore to Hagerstown, New York to Philadelphia, Philadelphia to Washington, and these subsidies were discontinued, and I am informed not a single train was discontinued in either case, but that the service was just as good after discontinuance of the subsidy as before. I further understand that in one case the railroad company stated that discontinuance of the subsidy would not affect the situation.

Another thing in this connection is that the speed of a train does not depend upon subsidies. There are many trains in the United States carrying mail that make better time than the subsidized trains. The Southern runs six passenger trains daily from Washington to Charlotte, N. C., and also No. 97, which is a mail and express train. One of the passenger trains, leaving Washington at 10.45 at night, No. 37, is a subsidized train. It runs to Charlotte in ten hours and forty minutes. No. 31, which runs daily, except Sunday, goes to Charlotte in nine hours and thirty-eight minutes, or one hour and two minutes quicker than the subsidized No. 37. It ought to be needless to refer to the argument that the appropriation goes to a southern enterprise, and therefore should have support, though such has been a serious contention in this House in the past. One of my constituents wrote me that it "was coming our way." As far as the money is concerned, it goes to the railroad stockholders, the vast majority of whom do not live in the South. Referring to this very appropriation a present member of the Cabinet in 1899, then a Member of this House from Massachusetts, said that the only people who were benefited by this appropriation were the stockholders of the railway, and he called it a gift to the railroads. While the trains go South, nearly the whole appropriation goes elsewhere. It has always been beyond my power to comprehend how the justice or the right of a thing depended upon its locality. For myself, I fail to see how any appropriation, otherwise wrong, can be made right because of its "coming our way." [Applause.] If it is right, to support it by such an argument tends to discredit it, as it is an appeal to selfishness and not to judgment.

It has been argued that this appropriation aids in building up the industries of the South. This presupposes that this appropriation gives the South her postal facilities, which we deny, and this is one of the disputed facts. Proper mail facilities no doubt aid the country, but whether the subsidy creates such facilities or whether the business of the country creates them is one of the issues. I contend that the business of the country creates and of necessity requires just such facilities as the railroads furnish, and that no facilities are furnished to the South except such as are essential to the railroad's continued enrichment from her business and industry. I deny that the Southern put on either of the trains running from this city until there was a direct and immediate necessity therefor in order to handle its traffic with proper dispatch. The amount of that traffic has fixed and its demands have created the service which the company is furnishing. The company was created to serve the public. It grows rich by it. The public has made it, not it the public.

Mr. LAMB. Has it not contributed a good deal toward that prosperity?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. The railroad has been an essential element in it, but this in no way affects my argument. There are many able advocates of this subsidy around me who will again vote for it, as they have voted for it heretofore. When you come to reply, since the Department did not recommend these items, the burden is yours to show their necessity and propriety. You can not deny the facts I shall state, for I have taken them from the best available statistics, and I challenge you to refute them. I repeat, the business of the country has made the railroad. As the industry of the people has developed it has extended, as it had to extend, its freight and its passenger service. But some one says, Look what service the system gave the people fourteen years ago before it got this subsidy and mark now the great improvement. He seems to forget that in that time there has been great improvement on every great railroad system in the country. You can name no great railroad that has remained stationary upon its service of fourteen years ago. The improvement in mail trains does not exceed, if indeed it equals, the improvement in through freight service.

Can any process of reasoning conclude that, except for the subsidy, the Southern Railway of all the great systems would alone have made no progress in its public service since 1892? Did it of all the systems alone require special help and discriminative favoritism to encourage it to keep up with the progress of the times and properly serve the great section that has poured millions into its treasury? I refuse to entertain the thought, and I remind this House that, in his report for the year ending June 30, 1892, before the Southern got this subsidy, the Postmaster-General complimented the Richmond and Danville (now the Southern), along with three other roads operating in the South, with expediting the mail to a great extent.

Mr. FINLEY. Does the gentleman know how long it was after this appropriation was voted by Congress before No. 97 was ever put on?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. The gentleman anticipates me. But another one says this subsidy gives us train No. 97. This we deny. If it be true, why didn't it give us 97 twelve years ago? The Southern has been getting this subsidy since July 1, 1893. Why did it withhold from the people No. 97 for ten years if the subsidy gives the people that train? The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 19, 1898, sets out a letter from Hon. James E. White, general railway mail superintendent, of date February 4, 1898, in which he said:

The Southern Railway, which is paid from this appropriation for special facilities, has not put on an extra train nor has it changed its schedule by reason of this appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, the great truth is that No. 97 was never thought of until the greatly increased passenger traffic—and under that head I class passengers, mail, and express—so loaded down its other trains that these were unable to make their schedules, and the running of another train became a traffic necessity. Why, does any intelligent person believe that train No. 37, leaving Washington at 10.45 at night, would be discontinued except for the subsidy? Can he give a reason for such belief? Yet the entire subsidy over the Southern is divided between that train and No. 97, which leaves here at 8 a. m.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Under this appropriation, is not 97 the only one that gets this extra pay?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. No, sir; the gentleman labors under a mistake. This subsidy is divided between 37 and 97.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I was asking the gentleman for information, and I want to ask him this further question. Does the Southern road run through your district and mine?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. It does.

Mr. BLACKBURN. How much advantage do your people get from 97?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. They get some advantage from 97, but none, in my judgment, from the special-facility provision, as I hope to show as I proceed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is why I asked you.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Those who fear that trains Nos. 37 and 97 would be discontinued have not the faith in the Southern that I have. Should Congress discontinue the subsidy, I do not know what schedules or trains, if any, would be affected. I feel sure that none should be affected unless the increased traffic again justifies a change for the improvement of the service. I refuse to believe that that great system would act in a spirit of pique and withhold from the people whose industry and business sustain it proper and adequate facilities in accordance with their needs. The Southern collected from the people last fiscal year over $48,000,000 of earnings, of which over $14,400,000 were net. Of these vast sums, over $24,000,000 were earned in the States of Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina, of which over $8,400,000 were net earnings. The entire subsidy to the Southern is $80,947.50, the balance of it going to roads from Atlanta to New Orleans. In other words, out of every $600 which the Southern collects $1 is subsidy. Now, will anyone assert his belief that on account of losing $1 out of $600, which would still leave over $14,300,000 net earnings, the Southern would deprive its patrons of adequate mail facilities? Mr. Chairman, I again declare that I have more faith in the Southern than to expect that. I have more faith than the boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and manufacturers' clubs in the thriving cities along its line in its sense of justice and propriety. The total earnings of all the railroads in Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina for the year ending June 30, 1905, were two and one-fourth times the earnings in same States for year ending June 30, 1894. Wonderful increase in eleven years.

In the last fifteen years the capital invested in cotton mills in the South has increased from $60,000,000 to $225,000,000. The value of the cotton crop has nearly doubled. The value of manufactured products increased from less than $1,000,000,000 to $1,750,000,000—an increase of $750,000,000. The value of farm products has more than doubled, and a hundred other evidences of progress abound. These have built up the railroads; these have required the improved service; and, Mr. Chairman, I can not appreciate properly the innocent zeal and the agile comprehension of one who ignores such facts and declares that the subsidy is responsible for the improved mail facilities of the South.

Mr. LAMB. I would like to have you define a subsidy.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I am going to do it. I have anticipated all of these arguments because I have read every speech that has been made in favor of this thing from the beginning, and I am ready to answer their arguments.

Mr. STANLEY. Has the gentleman ever heard of a high official of the railroad who did not promise in the way of a threat to take away from the people an advantage they have when you threaten to take away a subsidy?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. The Pennsylvania Railroad, I understand, about four years ago stated that the discontinuance of the subsidy from New York to this city would not affect its schedules.

Mr. Chairman, the business of the Southern Railroad system in Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina has grown so rapidly that its passenger earnings per mile of road operated in the last eleven years have increased from $1,675 to over $2,400 and its freight earnings from $2,325 to over $4,400 per mile; its total earnings from $4,000 per mile to over $6,800; showing an increase of $2,800 per mile, with a greatly increased mileage. Doubtless on its main line from here to Charlotte all earnings were greatly in excess of the above averages, and there is no doubt in my mind that the increase of earnings has been far greater from here to Charlotte than on any other part of the road.

Eleven years ago this system wanted and got $125 subsidy per mile to give the people adequate facilities. The road is now earning $2,800 more per mile than then, and yet it still wants $125 per mile subsidy to give its patrons adequate postal facilities, although every facility it now offers is justified and required by its increased business. Then its operating expenses in the three States named were 71 per cent of its gross earnings, now only 65 per cent, and yet the defenders of the appropriation assert that the South can not get proper mail facilities without the subsidy. Then its net earnings in these three States were $2,733,974, and last year they were $8,441,821, and still we are told it is not able to stand alone and give the people adequate facilities under the statutory pay.

In 1893, when this subsidy was first paid to this system, it ran only three passenger trains from here to Charlotte, Nos. 37, 11, and 35. Now it runs six through trains besides No. 97, so great has its passenger traffic increased. Can intelligence and candor assert that all these increased passenger trains have been put on by reason of the subsidy? There is just as much reason for such assertion as there is for the assertion that No. 97 is a product of the subsidy.

A familiar statement made by advocates of this subsidy, both in and out of this Hall, is that Congressmen vote for other appropriations which such advocates think are similar in principle, and one of the most common instances cited is the rural free-delivery service, which is not in fact, circumstance, or principle in any way related to it. It would be possible to likewise subsidize the rural service in this way; that is, give the carriers whose starting points are post-offices on the trunk line of railway from Washington City to New Orleans, and also to those carriers on the railway from Kansas City to Newton, Kans., but to no other carriers in the country, the sum of $300 each per annum in addition to the $720 they are now receiving, provided however, that no carrier should receive any of such additional pay for any day when he was more than a half hour behind his schedule in delivering his mail. Then it would be in principle like this railroad subsidy.

Doubtless many of the carriers who received such additional compensation for being prompt would desire its continuance, and its friends would have a multitude of arguments showing its necessity, and expressing fear that without it such carriers could no longer maintain such horses as would enable them to properly serve their patrons, owing to the peculiar condition of the country between Washington and New Orleans, and that if such additional compensation were withdrawn so that all carriers in the United States would be on the same footing and all receive pay under the same law, then it would be a strike at the South and her industry. [Applause.] But suppose some one thinks that some Member has voted for one wrong; will he contend that such Member is thereby required to support another? It is better to be inconsistent and right part of the time than to be consistent and wrong all the time. It is frequently urged in behalf of this item that one of the subsidized trains carries no passengers, but is an exclusive mail and express train. There are other roads that run such trains without subsidies. (Hearings, 207.) There are unsubsidized roads which do better than that and run exclusive mail trains without passengers or express (St. Louis to Kansas City, Chicago to Omaha, hearings, 208), and the route between St. Louis and Kansas City does not get as much pay per mile as the Southern from here to Danville gets under the regular rate. There are 3,064 railroad mail routes in the United States. Of all that number only fifteen get more pay per mile than the route from here to Danville under the regular pay, and each of these fifteen gives more mail trips per week than from Washington to Danville, except three. There are scores of routes that have more trips with less pay than this one. The average pay for transportation of mails throughout the United States is $198.20 per mile.

The Southern from here to Danville gets, according to the regular rate, $1,497.10 per mile for transportation and $325 per mile for rent of cars, a total of $1,822.10 per mile for carrying the mail, exclusive of the subsidy, or $434,169.28 for carrying the mail two hundred and thirty-eight and a fraction miles, and yet there are people who think it could not give proper mail facilities without being coaxed to keep its schedules by giving it an extra bonus of $125 per mile. It is my judgment that never has there been a more unjustifiable subsidy or bonus paid from the Public Treasury to any man or corporation. From here to Charlotte this company is paid for transportation of mails and rent of cars under the regular pay the great sum of $647,253.52, but so great is the misinformation on this subject that many of the good people of that city fear that unless we continue to take from the Treasury and give this company $125 per mile to induce it to keep its schedules that the railroad company will in some way deprive them of proper postal facilities. From Washington to Charlotte the total pay for transportation of mails and rent of cars when the subsidy was first authorized was $232,742.15. It is now more than two and a half times what it was then, and yet we are told the subsidy is still a necessity. More than that, the regular pay without the subsidy now is more than two and a fourth times what the company then received together with the subsidy, but the company holds on to the subsidy and will forever do so until Congress does its duty by discontinuing it. From here to Charlotte, under the regular rates, the Southern is paid more money per mile for carrying mail than any other road gets in the United States south of the Potomac and Ohio and west of the Missouri rivers, and yet gentlemen think it ought to have the subsidy.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. From here to New Orleans, $1,227,437.09, exclusive of the subsidy.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That is based on the weight?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. On the weight, at the regular rates paid all roads.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That is, on the volume of business?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. On the volume of business, without any preferential involved in it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, of all I have heard or read on this subject, and I have endeavored to make a thorough research concerning it, while I have encountered many fears that train No. 97 would disappear with this appropriation stricken out, I have found but two expressions of opinion, so far as I can recall, that such would be the result—one in a letter and the other expressed in this House by a Representative during a discussion in February of last year.

So far as I am informed, no man anywhere believes or even fears that the other subsidized train, No. 37, would be taken off. It will occur to everyone that some official of the interested railway companies would expressly declare that these trains would be taken off without the subsidy, if such would be the effect of the discontinuance of the subsidy. No official has made such declaration to this body or its committee, for the simple reason, in my judgment, that no official believes it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if any official of the Southern road appeared before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I am not on that committee, but suppose the Southern Railroad thought it was unnecessary for it to appear there, where had been developed so much friendship for it in times past on this proposition. [Applause.]

The railroad can not handle its mail, express, and passenger traffic from this city to Charlotte with two less trains than it now operates. Doubtless the day is not far distant when another train will have to be added to the present number. As I before intimated, I have no idea that either of these trains would be discontinued, unless the company should act in a spirit of resentment, and this I will not anticipate; but, on the contrary, I anticipate that it will continue to serve its patrons on business principles. One effect, I think, might follow, and regardless of the subsidy may follow, and that is other cars may be added to No. 97—maybe passenger cars. If such added cars should reduce its speed to the present speed of No. 31, it would reach Charlotte, N. C., eighteen minutes later than it now reaches Charlotte, and would reach Atlanta about thirty-two minutes later than it now does, which to the citizens of Atlanta would mean nothing, as it can make no difference whether their mail reaches there at 11.15 at night or an hour later, as people do not open their mail at midnight. Even as it is now it reaches Charlotte at 5.15 in the afternoon; and if we allow a reasonable time for it to reach the post-office, be opened, and delivered we will find that it is after business hours.

I want to call your attention to the fact that No. 97 was not put on by requirement of the Post-Office Department, as some may think, and its speed was not regulated by the Department. The Post-Office Department does not regulate the speed of any train. The Post-Office Department does not know the engines, roadbed, or other conditions upon which the speed of trains is determined. It has never undertaken to regulate the speed of a train. In regard to this particular train, it exercises sufficient control to hold it on its starting time some little after its regular schedule, if necessary to make connections.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Yes; if the New York train is not very late.

The portion of the subsidy which goes to it would not run a train which otherwise would be unnecessary and unremunerative. We have been told that the Coast Line voluntarily quit asking for the subsidy, though it continued to run the train which got all of it, because it would not maintain certain schedules for it. If that is true, does anyone think another road would, on account of the subsidy, put on an otherwise unnecessary train, which would get only one-half of it? And is it not reasonable and is it not the fact, as I believe it, that the Southern is running only those trains which are necessary to its traffic, and running them only at such speed as itself fixes, and starts them from this city at such times as it deems best for its business and the accommodation of its patrons, as every road is in duty bound to do? If under these circumstances, in addition to the regular revenues which come to all roads alike, it can also get from the public Treasury these extra thousands of subsidy for its stockholders, in these days of frenzied finance it will not hesitate to do it; and if Members of Congress intend to give this subsidy until the conscience of the favored railroad companies cries out against it, we had as well place it among our permanent laws and confess to the world that we have been unequal to the task confided to us by the people. [Applause.]

The responsibility is upon us, not upon others, and not upon the Department. We are the ones who ought to stand between the grasping greed of all great corporations and the people's Treasury. [Applause.] If you authorize the expenditure of this money to great corporations that will certainly bring pressure upon any official to get it into their own coffers, you need not expect any one official to resist their demands, if we ourselves can not resist them.

Mr. DICKSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. DICKSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company runs a special mail train out of St. Louis to Pittsburg, running through my district in southern Illinois. I ask this question, because the gentleman seems to be familiar with these subsidies and the postal-car regulations. That train carries nothing but mail, not even a coach. It is a special mail train.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Yes; there are many such trains in the country.

Mr. DICKSON of Illinois. I want to ask the gentleman, purely for information, whether he knows if that line received any subsidy or remuneration from the Government outside of the regular mail pay, or whether it has ever received any?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I do know that it is not receiving any. I do know that for many years not a cent of subsidy has been paid except to the through line from here to New Orleans, and to the Santa Fe road from Kansas City, Mo., to Newton, Kans. The only other line that has received a cent of subsidy in thirteen years is the one from here to New York, and the subsidy to it was discontinued several years ago.

Mr. Chairman, I think I can show that the train No. 97 is a highly paying, probably the best paying, train, exclusive of the subsidy, which the Southern operates between here and the city of Charlotte in proportion to its expense. It would be foreign to this debate to discuss at this time the excessive rates charged by railroads for freight and passengers. In what I am now about to say I shall not discuss the capitalization of the Southern, though

I will note in passing that the letter of ex-Senator Chandler of February 5, 1906, says its one hundred and eighty millions of stock is all water, nor will I discuss the regular mail pay under the statutes, which I believe to be excessive, nor the fact that the Government pays rent for each of the postal cars used on No. 97, and 37, too, as for that, from here to Atlanta, something like $16,000 each year, or about three times the average car rental—this being true, since postal cars of that class get every year from the Government $25 per mile of daily use—the rental of cars by the Government being also excessive. It has been stated in the House that the Government pays the railroads four times as much as it costs to carry the mails. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General in his report tells us that the companies plead for the through mail wherever there is competition. I would be glad to see the proper committee of this House propose a reduction in the regular mail pay and in the post-office car rentals. But taking things as they are, I propose to show that No. 97 is a train of great profit to the railway company, exclusive of the subsidy. I presume that it carries the same proportion of the mail from Danville to Charlotte as from Washington to Danville. In a letter replying to an inquiry from me, General Shallenberger, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, on February 23, 1906, said that at the last quadrennial weighings it was computed that No. 97 carried 35 per cent of the whole weight of mail between Washington and Danville, and that 35 per cent was 45,183 pounds.

Now, Mr. Chairman, No. 97 therefore gets 35 per cent of the transportation mail pay. The entire regular mail-transportation pay from here to Charlotte is, exclusive of car rents, $525,974.52, and 35 per cent thereof, which goes to No. 97, is $184,091.08, to which add the rental of the three post-office cars to Charlotte, $28,521, and we have a total of regular pay for No. 97 from here to Charlotte of $212,612.08; and, of course, it gets large pay from Charlotte to Atlanta, but not as much per mile as from here to Charlotte. There is not so much mail handled between those two places as from here to Charlotte, and there is not as much from Danville to Charlotte as from here to Danville. To this must be added what No. 97 receives from the express company, for it is a mail and express train. We know that a carload of express is much heavier than a postal carload of mail, perhaps three times as great, as the postal cars must have racks and plenty of space for the clerks to conveniently distribute the mail. But suppose the Southern's No. 97 only collects from the express company one-fourth of what it collects from the Government, which would be $53,153.02, then it earns from here to Charlotte, exclusive of the subsidy, $265,765.10, while its part of the subsidy from here to Charlotte is $23,767.50. With these facts staring one in the face, can he contend that a train that otherwise earns $265,765.10 will be discontinued if the subsidy is withdrawn? [Applause.] I do not believe that another train of the Southern earns as much as this one, according to its expense. I desire here to say that if any of my estimates or calculations are erroneous and any authorized railroad official will give me the exact facts and figures sustaining them, I will be glad to correct my remarks, even if I have to make another speech to do so. I will add however, that I have made inquiry, both of the railway company and the express company as to the quantity of express handled on train No. 97, and both replied that they did not have the information.

Another fact, for the year ending June 30, 1904, being the last year for which I have been able to get the statistics on this point, the average earnings of the Southern's passenger trains in Virginia, North and South Carolina, and these earnings include passenger, mail, and express, were less than 99 cents for each mile such trains ran, while the average earnings of train No. 97 from here to Charlotte, exclusive of the subsidy, according to figures above stated, are $1.91 for each mile run, or nearly double the general average.

Let us consider the matter in another way. If my estimate above is correct, then, exclusive of the subsidy, train No. 97, from here to Charlotte, earns each day from mail and express the sum of $727, while its daily part of the subsidy is $68.12. Now comes the question of its average daily expense, and of this I speak not as an expert, but as one who would be glad to have the exact figures if they are in existence. I shall give you my own estimates, but shall be glad to correct them if wrong. I understand that from here to Charlotte, a distance of 380 miles, three engines are used on No. 97 and three engine crews, though the last engine and crew go far beyond Charlotte, and therefore I estimate for two and a half crews from here to Charlotte. The Government of course pays the mail clerks, and the express company pays its men, and the train carries no baggage. Let us estimate that the engineers are paid $8 apiece, or $20 a day, and the firemen $4 apiece, or $10, making the daily cost of enginemen and firemen on No. 97 from here to Charlotte $30. Suppose the conductor and his help together get $15 a day, and that oil, water, coal, and other material cost $82 a day, at a very liberal estimate, which will make a total cost of the train from here to Charlotte of $127 each day, or of $46,355 a year. But to this cost should be added the train's proper part of the expense of the maintenance of the offices, shops, roadbed, repairs, etc., of the company, which I will put at $100 a day, or $36,500 a year, making a total cost chargeable to this train of $227 per day from here to Charlotte, or $82,855 a year, leaving a daily net profit of $500, or a clear profit of over 200 per cent, or a yearly profit of $182,500, exclusive of the subsidy. If it carries the express on a free pass without charge, then on the mail alone this train clears $130,000 a year, or more than 150 per cent profit.

Now, then, who will say that as a business proposition this railroad would discontinue this train if we vote away from this train $23,000? [Applause.] No; so I maintain if it ever discontinues this train it will be in a spirit of pique and resentment, because the representatives of the people, acting upon their judgment and conscience in this matter, refuse to gratify the greed of the company by a bonus. [Applause.]

Notwithstanding all these facts, Mr. Chairman, many of my constituents have been so misled on this subject that they urge me to vote to give the company this subsidy. And more than that, some prominent newspapers of the South, some of them in my State, have endeavored to reflect upon and embarrass those of us from the South who refuse to sacrifice our judgment and conscience upon this matter. One paper named me and said that in voting against this subsidy I would vote against my section of the country. One has declared that the appropriation is opposed in ignorance and stupidity or from a malignant attempt to hurt the South. This paper probably never gave the question an hour's research or a moment's consideration. If with full knowledge it made that declaration, it only shows to what lengths of error and vituperation the defenders of injustice and favoritism will go in assailing the motives and character of those whose facts they can not deny and whose argument they can not answer.

Another paper has commented on the fact that while the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] champions this appropriation, it is opposed by some Southern Representatives through whose districts the fast mail runs. When one understands the matter, the remarkable thing is not that some Democrats differ with the gentleman from Indiana, but that any Democrats agree with him on this appropriation. [Loud applause.] Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party is practically a unit against the ship-subsidy bill. In my judgment, there is more to condemn in principle in this appropriation than in the ship-subsidy bill. Under it the subsidy proposed would apply to all our steamship lines alike, thus having some show of equality in it, while this "special facility" pay does not apply to all roads alike, but is a special favoritism bestowed alone upon the lines from here to New Orleans and from Kansas City to Newton.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield ten minutes more. I regret I can not give the gentleman any more time..

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. It is beyond my understanding how any Democrat can oppose the ship subsidy and then support the railroad subsidy. Frequently gentlemen object to this appropriation being called a "subsidy." It is a subsidy or worse—a bonus, a gift. According to Webster's International Dictionary, a subsidy is a grant from the government to a "company to assist in the establishment or support of an enterprise deemed advantageous to the public." Is it not, according to the argument of its own supporters, a grant to the railroad to assist it in running two trains for the advantage of the public? Ordinarily governments have not subsidized any company unless its business was otherwise unprofitable, but here you subsidize companies whose business is greatly profitable. You give from the people's money to increase the treasury of the railroad. You subsidize trains for passengers and express as well as mail. Every pound of express carried on No. 97 and every passenger and all express on No. 37 are subsidized as well as the mail. Passengers and express get the benefit. What would a passenger say if the railroad should try to collect from him extra pay for getting him to his station on time, and what would one say who should be required to pay for his express an extra price because it came in due time. Yet you pay these companies extra for getting the mail to Charlotte on time. The railroad company fixes its schedule and you subsidize it to keep its own schedule. If it makes the schedule, it gets that day's subsidy; if it fails to make it, that day's subsidy is withheld. It is a bonus to induce the company to do its duty. Every day the company does its duty it gets this extra pay. If No. 97 leaves here on time and is five minutes behind the schedule which the company has fixed for it at Danville and Charlotte and Atlanta, it does not get for that day a cent of this subsidy, though it makes the trip; but if it is on time it gets the extra pay. I therefore state that it is a pure bonus to the railroad not to enable it to run the subsidized trains, but merely to persuade it in running them to keep its own schedules. [Applause.]

So strange are the influences that control actions that business men in my district, who would stand a lawsuit before they would pay the company an extra dollar over and above the regular price for getting them or their freight or express to their town on time, though by a subsidized train, yet urgently request me to vote to pay the company extra, over and above the regular statutory price, for getting the mail there on time.

We have heard much of the fines levied against these trains by the Department, and doubtless many people think the so-called fines are a punishment. If they were fined every day in the year by withholding the subsidy, they would then get the same pay as other roads. It is really, instead of being a punishment when they fail to keep the schedules, a bonus when they do keep them—such as no other roads in the country have.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have quite fully discussed this matter, but I desire it understood that my main opposition is to the principle involved in it. If we, by reason of our great industries, progressive enterprise, and increasing business, are entitled, as I contend we are, to the facilities which we now enjoy, then the great companies that are enriched by that business and enterprise should furnish us adequate mail facilities at the very profitable rates allowed to all under the general law, and it becomes a profligate waste of public money and an inexcusable badge of favoritism to grant this subsidy to the railroad companies.

If, on the other hand, our energy, business, enterprise, and traffic do not justify our present facilities and this subsidy bestows upon the people along the main line from Washington to New Orleans facilities to which they are not entitled, while withholding similar help from millions of our fellow-citizens who have not mail facilities equal to ours, then this subsidy becomes a vicious piece of partiality, a special privilege to a section, a legislative preference which, in my judgment, no Democrat should encourage and no patriot approve. On the one hand it is legalized graft to the companies; on the other it is legalized graft to their patrons. In either case it is unwise, vicious, undemocratic, and unworthy of the tolerance of a just Government. If the people—as I hope they soon will be—were as ready to condemn votes against their interests and to approve those in favor of justice and equality as the recipients of special privileges are ready to oppose those who resist their greed and to support those who vote for their projects, this subsidy would, in my opinion, long ago have been discontinued. [Applause.] I rejoice that the people, through the benefits of the press and the daily mail, are rapidly becoming watchful of public conduct.

Among those who have urged my support doubtless there are many misinformed, some misled, and others misdirected. Wide in scope, strong in effect, and varied in operation are the influences which have molded opinion upon this subject along the subsidized railway lines. Information has been withheld where knowledge would operate against the subsidy. The public conscience has been aroused and its sense of propriety shocked by discoveries of frauds among the high financiers of the country. In a less degree in its universality, perhaps, but no less genuine in its sincerity, will be the sentiment of the people against this subsidy when they once comprehend it in all of its phases. If the Representatives of the people stand, as they do stand, against the crimes of frenzied finance, they should also stand against the great offenses of governmental preference and favoritism. If Representatives stand, as they do stand, against the wrongs of insurance companies, they should likewise stand against the wrongs of railway companies. The people expect us, amid all the waves of excitement and against all the pressure of influence, to uphold the right as we see it. For myself, against the opposition which my position on this subsidy brings upon me, I cheerfully appeal to the conscience and judgment of the people of North Carolina, who have never yet bowed to frenzied finance or surrendered to the legions of greed. [Loud applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the expediency and the necessity for a deep waterway from Lake Michigan to the Gulf of Mexico are most obvious, and this Congress should appropriate a sum of money sufficient to enable the work to be pushed vigorously and steadily until a subsequent appropriation is available. In my opinion, Congress should authorize a continuous contract for the completion of this improvement. At any event, practical results should be secured.

Work on this great and beneficent project should begin at the earliest date possible and be continued uninterruptedly until completed. The work should be rushed, and no effort should be spared to complete it.

Mr. Chairman, we will never have a merchant marine such as our national wealth commands until ocean-going ships can sail into the heart of this continent, tie up at the wharves along this proposed route, and take on cargoes which can go unbroken to foreign markets.

I therefore believe, sir, that the Government should undertake earnestly the accomplishment of a project which will not only enable this to be done, but which will surely give to us that percentage of foreign business to which we are entitled.

Give the great Mississippi Valley a chance to get its products into the Latin-American countries by some cheap and direct means, such as this water route would afford, and we will not long be compelled to suffer the humiliation of permitting the international balance sheet to show a sum of $500,000,000 annually against us in our transactions with those countries.

Europe to-day furnishes Latin America with upwards of three-fourths of all she consumes. We furnish the rest. We purchase from those countries, however, three-fifths of all they produce.

We can easily have the bulk of this trade if Congress will but extend this canal as proposed. The cheap transportation thus afforded will attract from the great West and Northwest a traffic simply stupendous. Enormous as the commerce of that section is to-day it can easily be doubled when the cost of transportation becomes reasonable. The great States of Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota alone produce 26 per cent of the agricultural products of the United States and contain 19 per cent of its population. In these States there are 100,000 manufacturers, or 19 per cent of the number in the United States. In these institutions over $600,000,000 are invested; a million of workmen are employed, who earn $450,000,000 annually, or 16 per cent of all the wages paid in the United States—a good showing for five States out of forty-five, I respectfully submit.

It requires no strength of imagination, Mr. Chairman, to foresee the commercial benefits that will result from this improvement when the Panama Canal shall have been completed, and I have no doubt that it will be completed. The President asserts with great confidence and firmness that the canal will be built. Denial is therefore preposterous, and the roaring protests of certain turbulent demagogues will serve only to render its accomplishment more certain.

Mr. Chairman, all sections of this country should unite in an earnest effort to secure cheap transportation for carrying goods to and from the markets of foreign countries to the great sections of production of our own. The plain necessity for such action justifies the most lavish national exertion and expenditure even if pecuniary profit was our only object, which is not the case. When the Panama Canal is completed, commercial traffic with the Philippines, China, and Japan will afford an opportunity of introducing into those countries Christianity with its great rewards, which in itself is far more praiseworthy, and which will redound more to our glory as a nation than anything that can be gained by a satisfaction of our appetite for commercial greatness. While we are looking for foreign markets for the boundless resources of the prolific Mississippi Valley, let us not overlook an opportunity to teach the principles of Christian civilization.

Mr. Chairman, Europe can deliver the products of England, Germany, and France to points in Mexico and Central and South America at a cost three times less than we can deliver from our centers of production goods to the same points, simply because our exports and imports are largely controlled by railways whose rates are almost prohibitive. Under the present transportation system it costs, I am informed, something in the neighborhood of $30 per ton on freight from the West to points in Latin America. If the proposed canal were in operation to-day, the same articles could be transported to Latin America for $10 per ton, a difference of $20. Let us free the people, gentlemen, by constructing this deep waterway. They have paid tribute to the railroads long enough.

Mr. Chairman, this country spends 95 per cent on its land transportation and only 5 per cent for sea carriage. Products valued at $300,000,000 are annually imported into our country from South America in foreign bottoms, and we pay to these foreign ships $30,000,000 for this service alone. How does it happen that the United States has to-day 1,500,000 less tonnage on the seas than it had sixty-five years ago, and how long are we going to continue paying annually over five and one-half billion dollars for the transportation of passengers, mail, and freight around the world?

The building of this proposed deep waterway will correct the seeming indifference to me of the most commendable national enterprises. It will give an impetus to shipbuilding here in the United States such as was never before dreamed of. It will relieve the Interstate Commerce Commission of the further duty of railroad rate regulation, for it will certainly solve this most important question.

No railroad can charge higher freight rates than those made by a competing carrier and prosper. As proof of this assertion, permit me to call your attention to a part of the argument made by Mr. Frank J. Delaney, of Chicago, before the committee on appropriations of the forty-second general assembly of the State of Illinois, concerning the value of the Illinois and Michigan Canal to the farmers and shippers of the State and the effect upon freight rates.

Mr. Delaney's argument was in part as follows:

First. Freight rates (either water or rail) are markedly lower along the canal than at any other points in the State.

Second. That the low rail rates made by railways paralleling the canal force the nearest competing railroads on either side to make correspondingly low charges, though these roads may be miles distant from the canal proper, and that this influence is directly felt at a distance 40 or 50 miles either side of the canal.

Third (and it may be well to note this particularly). That the greater the distance from the canal the higher the freight rate, regardless of the distance from Chicago.

Assuming that the canal territory most directly influenced is the territory to be considered we find that the very presence of the canal, regardless of the volume of business done upon its waters, has saved to farmers of this territory about $1,500,000 in last year's crop of corn, oats, and wheat.

The following counties being what we will consider as "canal counties"—that is, those being the counties most directly and most noticeably influenced: Cook, Will, Dupage, Kane, Kendall, Grundy, Dekalb, Kankakee, Iroquois, Livingston, Woodford, Marshall, Lee, Bureau, Putnam, Stark, Peoria, and Tazewell.

These counties last year produced 973,340 bushels of wheat, 94,880,160 bushels of corn, and 65,579,274 bushels of oats. (Figures taken from report of 1899, Illinois State board of agriculture, computing corn at 40 bushels to the acre.)

A study of the various rates throughout this section and a reference to the rate map will show that the presence of the canal saves from 1½ cents to 4 cents in freight charges per hundred pounds on grain alone. Assuming, therefore, that the average saving of freight charges by this waterway is but 2 cents per hundred pounds—certainly a very conservative estimate—we find that this canal has saved to the farmers of this territory along during the last year approximately $1,500,000, and by a sympathetic reduction of freights throughout its competitive influence many times that sum.

Of the amounts of grain mentioned we may assume that perhaps one-third of this went to market and paid freight, this receiving the actual tangible benefit of the canal in dollars and cents. The other portion of the grain raised was consumed at home and received its proportion of the saving indirectly, and its market value was the same as and its benefit equal to the grain actually marketed.

When we consider that this computation includes corn, wheat, and oats, only three of the many products of this territory, we can readily see the immense value this comparatively short waterway is to our State.

The following table, taken from the proceedings of a convention of the Upper Mississippi River Improvement Association, held in Dubuque, Iowa, in November of last year, shows a comparison of all-rail with all-water rates:

A comparison of all rail with all water rates.

[In cents per 100 pounds.]

	Miles.	Classes.
		1.	2.	3.	4.	5.	6.	7.	8.	9.	10.

These rates are governed by two different classifications, but the Illinois to Cairo is the lower basis and makes the difference more pronounced than shown by the figures.

	Miles.	1.	2.	3.	4.	5.	A.	B.	C.	D.	E.
St. Louis to St. Paul, Minn., by water	582	0.63	0.52½	0.42	0.26	0.21	0.26	0.21	0.18	0.15	0.13½
St. Louis to Oklahoma City, Okla., by rail	543	1.30	1.09	.97	.84	.67	.65	.53	.40	.37	.29

In this instance rates forced by water competition are less than half of the other.

St. Louis to New Orleans, La., by water	706	0.90	0.75	0.65	0.50	0.40	0.35	0.25	0.25	0.25	0.20
St. Louis to Lauderdale, Miss., by rail	493	1.33	1.11	.95	.80	.62	.54	.41	.44	.33	.25

Lauderdale is intermediate to New Orleans on the M. and O. Rwy.

Instead of being detrimental I believe deep waterways to be essential adjuncts to successful railway operation, and I thoroughly believe, Mr. Chairman, that this proposed deep waterway would be a veritable boon to railroads contiguous thereto. It would stimulate business and take away from them freight of a nonproductive nature. All well-regulated waterway systems have benefited adjoining railroads. The best railroad authorities in our country recognize the fact that water competition, instead of being a detriment to the railroads, is a benefit to them. Railroads handle with small profit freight usually carried by water. If anyone doubts that this argument rests on a sound basis, let him study the contemporaneous development of railroads and canals in France. In our own country the most prosperous railroads are those that parallel waterways.

A comparison of the stock lists of roads running to and from the seaports and lake ports with those of interior cities will satisfy any fair-minded man, it seems to me, of the truthfulness of this assertion. Take the New York stock quotations of this year. Note the roads whose securities are above par.

Railroads having competing waterways: Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, 200; Michigan Central, 200; Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, preferred, 174⅜; Chicago and Northwestern, preferred, 228½; Delaware and Hudson, 202⅜; New York Central, 145¾; New York, New Haven and Hartford, 200½.

Railroads having no competing waterways: Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe, preferred, 102; Baltimore and Ohio, 110¼; Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis, 99; Chesapeake and Ohio, 57⅞; Atlantic and Pacific; Colorado Coal and Iron, 60⅜; Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, 66¾ New York, Lake Erie and Western, preferred; Denver and Rio Grande, 86⅝; Texas and Pacific, 34.

These quotations are self-explanatory and I do not care to make further argument in defense of my assertion that waterways benefit adjoining railroads. We are here to legislate for the people and not for the railroads. The railroads of this country, with their subsidies and land grants, are estimated to be worth between $18,000,000,000 and $19,000,000,000, and should be able to get on without further governmental assistance.

The Government has gone far enough, in my humble opinion, in bestowing favors upon great railroad corporations—favors which have no doubt been judiciously used for the betterment of the people. I make no complaint against Government land grants and subsidies to certain railroads. I think perhaps they were necessary and have proven beneficent. But the railroads need no further aid by way of subsidies from the Government.

The present transportation facilities are inadequate and wholly unsatisfactory. With present high freight rates, transshipments, etc., competition with other sections of our country, and more especially with foreign countries, is out of the question. That this, the richest territory on earth, embracing, as it does, half of the States in the Union, with a navigable river system of 20,000 miles, and possessing half of the nation's population, should have been so long denied a direct and economical means of transportation for its enormous commerce is a problem to solve which would require faculties I do not possess. Fairness demands that this section of our country, upon which the stability of the nation rests, should be given all Government aid possible to encourage it to increase its commercial supremacy. Men who are broad-minded enough to see the future greatness of the United States and who have the power of taking in the interests of the whole country realize fully the importance of speedy action on the part of the Government to the end that this commercial supremacy be maintained.

Mr. Chairman, the Mississippi Valley has an area of 1,350,000 square miles. It is 2,500 miles in length and 2,000 miles in width. Within its boundaries lie the greatest producing States in the Union; yea, in the world. The arms of its principal river reach out from east to west and, with the Missouri, form the boundary lines of twenty-one States and affords 20,000 miles of navigation.

What a splendid opportunity is here afforded by this proposed deep waterway to give to this section of our country, which has raised us from a debtor to a creditor nation, cheap transportation for its commerce to foreign markets. This great valley produces 75 per cent of all our foreign exports, only a small portion of which, however, finds a direct route to foreign markets. Commerce for export should go direct and in American bottoms. It is a shame, Mr. Chairman, that over 90 per cent of the export trade of this country is carried in foreign bottoms. Give to this fruitful region the cheap and necessary means of transportation, and a mighty impetus will be given to the shipbuilding industry. By no subsidies, save the expenditure by the Government of money in the permanent betterment of channels, an American merchant marine has grown up on the Great Lakes which excels the merchant marine of any foreign nation except England and Germany. Machinery for the rapid handling of cargoes, such as seen in no other part of the world, has been invented and placed in extensive use in lake transportation. The capacity of the ships in the active carrying of freight has been greatly increased, whereby cargoes of 100,000 bushels of grain are loaded within five hours and unloaded in six hours. Five thousand tons of ore are placed on shipboard within three hours, and the cargo is taken out in the light of a working day. Coal drops from car-dumping machines into the holds of vessels, and within three hours of the time they tie up to the dock they have on board from 3,000 to 5,000 tons and are ready to sail again. Vessel owners claim that nowhere in the world has the science of handling freight economically and rapidly reached so high a state of perfection as in the lake service. The ships built at the shipyards during the present decade will compare favorably with vessels of the same class built anywhere in the world.

The marvelous development of Chicago is due largely to the fact that the city is located at the point where railroad transportation and water transportation meet. The growth of the city has been but the reflex of the development of the West, and the traffic of the West has come to Chicago because its products could be shipped at lower rate through the Chicago River than elsewhere.

It would be a reiteration of a familiar story and a waste of your time to urge the magnitude of Chicago's commerce and manufactories. We might call your attention to the fact that this city is the largest railroad center in the world, that it holds the lead in many lines of manufacturing, and that as a primary market for grain it has no rival. Her position in the commercial, financial, and manufacturing life of the nation needs no detail of statistics. [Loud applause.]

I desire at this point, Mr. Chairman, to call the attention of the House to a table, prepared at the customs office at Chicago, which shows the lake commerce of Chicago for 1904, in order that some idea may be had of the great tonnage received and shipped from that port:

These figures serve to show in part the greatness of the commerce of Chicago and the surrounding country and how important a part they are of the commerce of the nation.

The great city of Chicago, cognizant of the future commercial greatness of the West and Northwest and realizing the imperative future necessity of a ship canal from Lake Michigan to the Gulf of Mexico, burdened itself by taxation to the amount of $18,000,000 in excess of what was necessary to build a canal for drainage purposes alone, as was originally contemplated.

This, in many respects the greatest engineering project ever undertaken, renders the continuation by the Government of a deep waterway to the Gulf of Mexico exceedingly easy and inexpensive. Some idea of its magnitude and importance may be had by a perusal of a memorial recently presented to the Congress of the United States by the trustees of the sanitary district of Chicago, the following extracts of which I desire to insert in the RECORD for the benefit of Members desiring to enlighten themselves upon this great subject:

THE CHICAGO SANITARY AND SHIP CANAL.

The Chicago Sanitary and Ship Canal may well be called the greatest artificial waterway ever constructed, and in its character of a navigable channel it stands ready to hand for the benefit of the Federal Government as a complete and in every respect satisfactory section of a deep waterway from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi River. It is, indeed, because of this character of the Sanitary and Ship Canal, and because it was designed for such ultimate use, that your memorialists, who have had its construction in their charge, are able to address you as parties deeply interested in the development of the waterway.

Before describing the inception and construction of the canal in detail it is well to point out again the place it fills in the general plan. It cuts through the divide between the Chicago River and the headwaters of the Desplaines, which is, by far, the most difficult and expensive portion of the entire work of construction. Its cost, when completed, will be close to $55,000,000, more than double the amount which will be necessary, as figures to be presented later will show, for the entire remainder of the work. It carries a volume of water large enough to furnish a steady supply for a waterway 14 feet deep, from its commencement at Chicago to the Mississippi River at St. Louis. To give it this capacity at least $18,000,000 more was spent upon it than would have been necessary to meet the demands of its use for sanitation alone.

The Chicago Sanitary and Ship Canal was, as has been said, primarily constructed for the disposal of the sewage of the city of Chicago, which had previously passed into Lake Michigan, polluting the water supply of the city. Notwithstanding this use of the canal, it is not to be thought that it is an unpleasant stream. So great is the volume of water provided that the canal is clear and odorless, and, in fact, in better condition hygienically than the ordinary river flowing through an inhabited country.

The construction of the canal was authorized by State law May 29, 1889, and the sanitary district of Chicago was organized for the work, its territory including all that part of Chicago lying north of Eighty-seventh street, with the exception of two small outlying suburbs, and 43 square miles of Cook County outside of the city limits. Its total area is 185 square miles. The district is 18 miles long from north to south and 9½ miles wide on a line east and west through the city hall. Its extreme width is 15 miles.[a] The nine trustees to whom the control of the district was given were authorized to levy taxes to the extent of one-half of 1 per cent per annum on the assessed valuation of the property of the district; and for the five years from 1895 to 1899 they were allowed a tax rate of 1½ per cent. They were also empowered to issue bonds to the amount of 5 per cent of the taxable property of the district, with the provision that that amount should not exceed $15,000,000, a limitation which in 1901 was raised to $20,000,000 to enable further improvement of the Chicago River. The total bond issue to date has been $24,790,000, of which amount $17,565,000 is still outstanding. The total income of the district from taxes to date has been $27,950,766.38.

The first board of trustees of the district, elected December 12, 1889, consisted of John J. Altpeter, Arnold P. Gilmore, Christoph Hotz, John A. King, Murry Nelson, Richard Prendergast, William H. Russell, Frank Wenter, and Henry J. Willing. Trustees Hotz, King, Nelson, and Willing resigned early in their terms, however, and in their places William Boldenweck, Lyman E. Cooley, Bernard A. Eckhart, and Thomas Kelly were elected.

The second board of trustees, elected November 5, 1895, included Trustees Boldenweck, Eckhart, Kelly, and Wenter, of the former board, and the following new members: Joseph C. Braden, Zina R. Carter, Alexander J. Jones, James P. Mallette, and Thomas A. Smyth.

November 6, 1900, the present board of trustees was elected, Trustees Braden, Carter, Jones, Smyth, and Wenter being returned, and William H. Baker, Frank X. Cloidt, William Legner, and Thomas J. Webb taking the places of retired members.

The presidents of the board have been:

Murry Nelson, February 1, 1890, to December 2, 1890.
Richard Prendergast, December 2, 1890, to December 8, 1891.
Frank Wenter, December 8, 1891, to December 3, 1895.
Bernard A. Eckhart, December 3, 1895, to December 8, 1896.
Thomas Kelly, December 8, 1896, to December 7, 1897.
William Boldenweck, December 7, 1897, to December 4, 1900.
Alexander J. Jones, December 4, 1900, to December 3, 1901.
Thomas A. Smyth, December 3, 1901, to December 8, 1903.
Zina R. Carter, December 8, 1903.

Ground was broken for the work of excavation September 3, 1892, Trustee Wenter, then president of the board, throwing the first shovelful of earth. From that time forward the work was pushed in the face of every obstacle, and at times with a rapidity hitherto unknown in channel digging; as, for example, when in a single month, August, 1894, 1,291,688 cubic yards of glacial drift and 413,164 yards of solid rock were excavated. Many new methods were introduced for the gigantic task, and schemes of a boldness fitting the great enterprise were adopted. Finally, after more than seven years of work, the canal and enough of the coordinated works were finished to make it possible to begin to put it to use. January 2, 1900, the water of the Chicago River was turned into the channel, and fifteen days later the gates at the lower end were opened, and for the first time in centuries the water of the lake began to flow toward the Gulf of Mexico.

The canal proper is, as now being extended, 32.3 miles long, but in addition 6 miles of the Chicago River and 2¼ miles of the Desplaines River have been improved by the district, so that the stretch of water over which control has been formally assumed, in accordance with the law, is 40.55 miles long. The Chicago River has become an uninterrupted part of the channel, with even better navigable depth than the canal proper, while the Desplaines has only been improved sufficiently to answer the sanitary purposes of the canal.

The Chicago River, prior to the opening of the canal, was a short and deep stream, branching to the north and to the south a mile back from the lake. With little fall, and small sources of supply excepting the water poured into it from many sewers, it was almost stagnant. As its dock lines had never been carefully preserved, its banks were irregular, the bed varying greatly in width at different places. The problem which the sanitary district had to face was the enlarging of this river so that it would provide a sufficient volume of water for the needs of the canal without producing a current injurious to navigation. This was accomplished in the first instance by dredging to a depth of 20 feet (except over tunnels), and by the construction of two by-passes or conduits, with dimensions of 16 by 50 feet, on the west side of the river from Monroe to Van Buren streets, where the channel was narrowest. Several of the most obstructive center-pier bridges were also removed.

Later on, however, after the water was turned into the canal, in 1900, a systematic study of river improvement to meet the needs of navigation was made, and the district by ordinance adopted a policy which provided for the widening of the river to 200 feet and its deepening to 26 feet through the entire length used in securing water supply. At the same time a depth of 30 feet was indicated as ultimately desirable. Under the ordinance condemnation proceedings have been begun for all the necessary land which could not be secured by purchase, and dredging, piling and docking have been going on simultaneously at many points. At the same time plans have been made to remove all of the center-pier bridges in the river, and substitute bascule bridges for them. Some of these bridges are already finished, others in process of construction, and the remainder will be contracted for as rapidly as is possible without interfering too seriously with traffic on the streets. The estimate for the total cost of this work is $9,000,000. At this writing, June, 1904, about 42 per cent of it has been finished. The completion of this work is dependent upon the rapidity with which the courts will handle the necessary condemnation suits. With all of the property in the possession of the district, the construction work could be completed in two years. With the completion of the work under these plans, the Chicago River will be a perfect navigable stream, of a uniform depth of 26 feet, saving only for the presence of three street railway tunnels, the removal of which is certain to come in the near future, but must wait the action of either the city of Chicago or the Federal Government.

The Sanitary and Ship Canal proper begins at the west fork of the south branch of the Chicago River at Robey street, and extends 28.05 miles to Lockport. The depth of water in it varies with the flow, but the construction is such that under no conditions will the minimum be less than 22 feet. The present depth is between 24 and 25 feet. The channel is cut part of the way through glacial drift and part of the way through rock.

From Robey street to Summit, a distance of nearly 8 miles, the channel is 110 feet wide at the bottom and 198 feet wide at the water line. This part of the channel is cut through soil which permits easy dredging while the channel is in use, and for this reason it was not given its full capacity at the start, but left for enlargement as needs require. From Summit to Willow Springs, something over 5 miles farther, the channel is cut through earth with much hard material mixed in it, and it has the full planned dimensions, being 202 feet wide at the bottom and 290 feet at the water line. From Willow Springs to Lockport, 15 miles, the channel is through rock, and is 160 feet wide at the bottom and 162 feet at the water line. The average depth of the trough cut through the rock in this section is 35 feet. The grade of the channel is 1⅛ inches to the mile through the earth sections, and 3½ inches to the mile through the rock section. The bottom of the channel at Robey street is 24.448 feet below Chicago datum, the datum being reckoned from low water in Lake Michigan in 1847. At Lockport the bottom of the channel is 30.1 feet below datum.

At Lockport there is in the canal a large windage basin, cut in the stone to enable large vessels to turn around. Here also are the controlling works, by means of which the flow of water in the canal is governed. These works consist of seven sluice gates of metal with masonry bulkheads, and one bear-trap dam. The sluice gates have a vertical play of 20 feet and openings of 30 feet each. The bear-trap dam has an opening of 160 feet and an oscillation of 17 feet vertically. This dam is essentially two great metal leaves, hinged together and working between masonry bulkheads. The downstream leaf is securely hinged to a heavy foundation, and the raising or lowering of the dam is accomplished by the admission or discharge of water through regulating valves. The dam is regarded as one of the greatest engineering triumphs of the age.

From Lockport to the southern limits of Joliet, 6½ miles, the work of the sanitary district consisted in the deepening, widening, and leveling of the Desplaines River, so that it will accommodate a flow of 1,500,000 cubic feet of water a minute. This capacity provides both for the flow from the sanitary canal and for all possible flood waters of the Desplaines Valley. No attempt was made in this part of the work to establish the navigable depth, which was one of the primary considerations in the plans from Chicago to Lockport.

There is now, however, under construction by the sanitary district on this section a work of water-power development which, when it is completed, will afford a 22-foot channel for 3.3 miles and a 10-foot channel for 1 mile, the two covering over half of the entire distance. This water power, created by the heavy declivity of 52 feet in 8 miles on this section, is exceedingly valuable, the gross tolls possible from it being estimated on different methods of development at from $628,150 to $1,086,300 a year. The cost of the development will be $3,000,000. Besides the power now being developed below Lockport the district will, as soon as it can acquire the necessary property, develop a second power near the southerly limits of the city of Joliet. This second power will afford about 18,000 net horsepower with the full flow of the channel. This is called the Hickory Creek development, and the building of the dam necessary for its accomplishment will afford nearly a mile of waterway about 13 feet in depth.

The flow of water which the canal is designed to accommodate is 600,000 cubic feet per minute. In its present condition the canal will not, however, admit this volume in all parts without producing a current harmful to navigation. The narrow section of the canal between Robey street and Summit will carry only 300,000 cubic feet at a current of a mile and a quarter an hour. The Chicago River will, as yet, handle little over 300,000 cubic feet; but a flow of 480,000 cubic feet will be possible when the work now under way is finished, while an additional volume of 120,000 cubic feet will be supplied through a large conduit to the Lake along Thirty-ninth street. The actual flow of water in the Chicago River is regulated in accordance with the orders of the Secretary of War. At present the flow permitted is 250,000 cubic feet per minute. With the progress of improvements in the river the increase of the permissible flow is to be expected.

The building of the canal involved the construction or alteration of many bridges, and in this, as in every part of the work, the needs of navigation were always kept in mind. The bridges are all either of the swing or rolling lift type, and the district boasts some of the largest lift bridges ever constructed. One of the railway bridges has space for eight tracks. Thirty-seven bridges have already been built or contracted for, and there are many more to be placed across the Chicago River. The following table shows their distribution on different parts of the channel:

[a] By an act of the legislature of the State of Illinois in the year 1903, 78.6 square miles of territory to the north were added to the corporate limits of the original sanitary district and 94.5 square miles to the south. The present total area is now 358.1 square miles and 38 miles long from north to south.

Of the total cost $18,000,000 at least would have been saved had the channel been made merely sufficient for the needs of sanitation, and not built with a view to the creation in the future of a deep waterway. The additional cost in the one matter of bridges alone, to make them all movable, so that they would not hinder navigation, was close to $2,500,000.

To make the immensity of the work done by the sanitary district all the clearer the following table of the quantities involved in the construction work, completed and under contract, as taken from the 1903 report of the chief engineer, is presented:

DESCRIPTION AND ESTIMATES OF THE PROJECTED DEEP WATERWAY.

Having described the Chicago Sanitary and Ship Canal as a complete section of a deep waterway to the Mississippi, and having shown that from it the full flow of water necessary to the waterway can be secured, your memorialists wish to point out one further fact in connection with it before proceeding to discuss in detail the projected improvement of the route. This is, that the Sanitary and Ship Canal is itself a most powerful engineering aid to the further work which must be undertaken. Considered as a mere instrument for the scouring of the bed of the Illinois River, the flow of water from the sanitary canal is worth millions of dollars, because it will save millions that would otherwise have to be spent. In broad rivers, such as is the Illinois for the greater part of its course, there is a tendency to alluvial deposits, and a large volume of water scours the channel and keeps it clear. The water from the sanitary canal thus becomes a force so powerful that engineers will take it into account from the very beginning of their reckonings. The full flow of 600,000 cubic feet of water per minute, possible in the Sanitary and Ship Canal, is one-half the volume in the Mississippi River at Rock Island during the low-water season. Its discharge into the Mississippi from the mouth of the Illinois at Grafton will therefore materially increase the volume of the Father of Waters for a great part of the year. It follows that, even below Grafton, in the Mississippi itself, the water from the Sanitary and Ship Canal will be an important aid in the engineering operations necessary for the establishment of permanent deep-water navigation.

From Lake Michigan at Chicago to St. Louis, following the water route, is 362 miles. Of this distance the Sanitary and Ship Canal has already fully developed 34 miles. There are 286 miles of the Desplaines and Illinois rivers to be improved, and the Mississippi River section covers 39 miles.

When the deep-waterway survey which your honorable body has authorized is completed, you will be in possession of full information as to the work which must be done and the expenses which must be incurred. Pending that time, it is nevertheless possible, as a result of preliminary surveys and estimates made on behalf of this sanitary district and of other organizations interested in the establishment of a deep waterway, to give figures and estimates that are close to the truth.

These estimates are made on the basis of a 22-foot channel from Chicago to Lake Joliet and a 14-foot channel from that point to the mouth of the Illinois. The 14-foot figure is chosen because it is that depth for which the sanitary and ship canal provides the necessary flow of water. An estimate of the cost of establishing a 14-foot channel from the mouth of the Illinois to St. Louis is also given, though it does not pretend to the same accuracy as the other estimates.

The characteristics of the river valley from the lower end of the Sanitary and Ship Canal to the Mississippi are of such nature that the distance can well be divided into three sections, requiring different methods of development and varying greatly in probable expense. The following table shows the main facts for these sections, as well as for the Sanitary and Ship Canal and for the Mississippi River as far as St. Louis.

A discussion of the work still remaining to be done in order to secure such a deep waterway will now be given.

THE JOLIET SECTION—LOCKPORT TO LAKE JOLIET.

A depth of 22 feet, rather than of 14 feet, is dictated on the Lockport-Lake Joliet section of the proposed waterway, partly because the water-power development plans of the sanitary district will produce that depth for over half of the distance, and partly because, where the channel must be cut through rock, that depth will furnish the most economical method of handling the volume of water required on the lower reaches of the waterway. The sanitary district's water power plans have been carefully made with a view to future waterway construction, and the dams to be built will furnish no obstacles whatever. Two locks will be required. A location has been provided for a lock at the upper dam, giving a lift of about 34 feet. For the lower lock a location is set apart on the west side of the river. The locks must be large enough to handle whole fleets of barges and tugs.

The construction of the deep waterway on this section is the most difficult and expensive, mile for mile, that is required on any portion of the route. The total cost is estimated at $8,000,000, of which, as has been said, the sanitary district is preparing to spend $3,000,000, or about half of the primary cost of cutting the channel proper through the rock. The additional cost is required for the two great locks. An expenditure of $5,000,000 will, it is thought, be ample for the Government's share of the work, and it has been frequently suggested that the State of Illinois construct this section by prison labor from the penitentiary at Joliet, through which city the course runs.

THE UPPER ILLINOIS SECTION—LAKE JOLIET TO UTICA.

The 54 miles of the river immediately below Lake Joliet are much more easily handled from an engineering standpoint. The level of Lake Joliet is 76 feet below Lake Michigan, and the fall of 66 feet from this to the Utica level of 142 feet below the lake is made in a series of pools and rapids, according to the nature of the resisting strata. The three pools—Lake Joliet, Lake Du Page, and the pool above Marseilles—cover about one-third of the distance. There is a well-defined outlet valley and a developed stream bed, deeply cut for the greater part of the way. The distance between banks is from 500 to 700 feet. The tributary watershed varies from 6,400 square miles, at the mouth of the Kankakee, to 10,400 square miles at Utica, and gives rise to floods which come in part during the season of navigation. There are no artificial obstructions, except the mill dam at Marseilles, but six highway and three railroad bridges will require alteration.

The studies thus far made indicate the possibility of a proper treatment without injury to any great area of bottom lands. Lake Joliet, at the upper end of this section, is 5 miles long, and needs nothing but the cutting away of deposits in the shape of narrow gravel bars to insure the proper depth. In the rapids, the considerable declivity and consequent velocity make necessary a large and deep channel in the interests of navigation. Studies thus far made have proceeded for a depth of 14 feet and a width of 300 feet. Three levels or pools will be necessary, and three dams or locks. A 14-foot channel, with locks designed for an ultimate depth of 20 feet, can be secured, it is estimated, for $10,000,000.

THE LOWER ILLINOIS—UTICA TO THE MOUTH OF THE ILLINOIS.

The problem of river improvement changes entirely again after Utica is passed. From that city southward, the Illinois is an alluvial stream with a declivity so small as to be almost unique among American rivers, amounting to only 28 feet in the natural river, and only 32 feet from the level of the pool formed by the Henry dam at Utica bridge to the low-water line of the Mississippi. The stream bed is from 600 to 900 feet wide, and some 700 square miles of bottom lands are subject to overflow, the situation being complicated by backwater from the Mississippi, which at extreme high water is on a level with natural low water 30 miles below Utica. The banks are low, averaging not more than 12 to 14 feet above low water. There are four dams and locks, two built by the State at Henry and Copperas Creek and two by the United States at La Grange and Kampsville on this section.

Experience in dredging the sand bars showed a reasonable permanence in results, even with the smaller volumes of water, before the Chicago Sanitary and Ship Canal was opened, but the volume was not sufficient to maintain a channel more than 4 to 6 feet deep. In the last two years, since the sanitary canal was opened, it has been possible to maintain a channel 7 feet deep and 200 feet wide, except at the mouth of the Illinois, without great trouble. When the full flow of 10,000 cubic feet a second passes out of the canal, this depth will be increased without further dredging. It is easy to see what a great effect this volume of water will have on the channel, for it is sixteen times greater than that of natural low water at La Salle, and eight times greater than at the mouth of the Illinois. It is a very appreciable quantity, even in comparison with bankfull figures, 12 feet above low water, which official measurements before the opening of the sanitary canal showed to be 18,000 to 22,000 cubic feet per second from Utica to Havana, 30,000 cubic feet at La Grange, and 40,000 cubic feet at Kampsville. The average low-water flow at the present time may be placed at about 5,000 cubic feet.

The problem, therefore, becomes the creation of an additional depth of 7 feet, and this can be secured for the most part by cheap hydraulic dredging. It is estimated that 70,000,000 yards would have to be removed, but for all of it there can be found easy places of deposit on the back channels, sloughs, and marshes near the banks, to the benefit of the bottoms. A channel 300 feet wide and 14 feet deep can be secured, it is believed, at a cost not to exceed $7,000,000. This does not make allowance for the aid which the scouring action of the augmented volume of the stream would give to the project, nor does it take into account economies in methods, which could be introduced on a work undertaken on so large a scale. For the $7,000,000 it is thought that practically 100,000,000 yards instead of 70,000,000 yards could be handled, and the channel could be made larger by just that proportion.

THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER, GRAFTON TO ST. LOUIS.

No detailed studies have been made as yet for this section of the route, but there is no reason to doubt that a 14-foot channel could be maintained. Of the 39 miles, with their total fall of 21 feet, the first 20 miles to Alton have a fall of only 7 feet, and by the establishment of a dam at that city, raising low water perhaps 10 feet, the extension of deep water to this point would be comparatively easy.

The next 19 miles have a fall of 14 feet, and the situation is complicated by the entrance of the Missouri. If the deepening of the channel should prove difficult it would still be quite possible to carry deep-water navigation to St. Louis Harbor by a short canal, and by developing channels behind Chouteau and Cabaret islands.

A deep waterway over this route could probably be kept open the entire year, for ice is much less of an obstruction to navigation on such a channel than on the Great Lakes. Records kept at Morris, on the upper Illinois, show an ice season of sixty to seventy days, as against one hundred and twenty to one hundred and forty days on the lake routes from Chicago to Buffalo. Possibly in two-thirds of the years ice would offer no obstruction at all to river navigation, while in the other years ice boats would easily keep navigation open.

The total estimate of the cost of all of these improvements from Lockport to St. Louis is $27,000,000, exclusive of what the sanitary district is to spend. While the estimates given are in some cases very liberal, it is not to be assumed that the total cost will be less than this amount; but it will certainly not greatly exceed it. Moreover, the channel may be put in use for navigation long before the entire amount is spent. The first 8 miles from Lockport to Lake Joliet would have to be completed as a whole at the outset. Lower down three locks and dams would also have to be finished to their final capacity before the opening of the deep waterway. The rest of the work could, however, be carried on at leisure afterwards, the prism of the river being progressively developed from year to year.

If a depth of 20 feet for the entire way is desired it would be perfectly possible to secure it without excessive additional cost. It would, however, be necessary to enlarge the Chicago Sanitary and Ship Canal, so as to provide at least double the volume of water it is now capable of carrying. The extension of a 20-foot channel from Lake Joliet to Utica would involve only a fraction of the cost of a 14-foot channel, while a 20-foot depth in the lower Illinois is simply a matter of water supply and dredging. The large volume of water would be here necessary as an insurance against deterioration. The total additional cost which a 20-foot channel instead of a 14-foot channel from Lockport to St. Louis would involve is roughly placed at $60,000,000.

A 20-foot channel in the Illinois valley is, however, not advocated by your memorialists as an affair of the present, because its full utilization would depend upon the establishment of a similar depth in the lower Mississippi to the Gulf of Mexico. As conditions now stand, the Mississippi offers a 14-foot depth below St. Louis, to equal the 14 feet now urged for the Illinois, for from five to seven months in the average year. An assured minimum of 9 to 10 feet is promised. The method by which a 20-foot depth in the lower Mississippi can be secured is not yet clear, though there is no reason to doubt its ultimate possibility.

Summarizing the facts thus far brought out, but leaving for the next section the discussion of the commercial importance of the deep waterway project, your memorialists respectfully urge upon your consideration the following points:

1. The construction of the proposed waterway is thoroughly practicable.

2. It does not involve the cutting of a new channel through rock, but is really the deepening and improving of an existing waterway, and so is consistent with the known policy of Congress.

3. The Chicago Sanitary and Ship Canal stands completed and ready for use as the eastern section of such a waterway.

4. The total cost of developing and making available a channel which in connection with the Sanitary and Ship Canal will furnish a waterway of 22 feet depth for the first 42 miles, and of 14 feet depth for the rest of the way, will not exceed $22,000,000 to the mouth of the Illinois or $27,000,000 to St. Louis, the larger figure being little more than half of what the sanitary district of Chicago will alone have spent when its entire work is finished.

5. Besides serving the purposes of navigation, the proposed channel would provide for the flood waters of the Desplaines and Illinois rivers, and thus prevent the serious injury now done almost yearly to the dwellers along the river valleys.

6. The State of Illinois has by legislation and by joint resolution of its general assembly not only formally given approval to the project, but contingently turned the channel over to the Federal Government for navigation purposes, the Government control to begin as soon as the full length of the waterway is open.

7. The 14-foot minimum depth is suggested as desirable, but without prejudice against any other depths which may prove after fuller surveys to be better.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I have had the pleasure of listening in the last few months to very excellent addresses on the part of several Members of this House on the general subject of immigration; and I desire to speak briefly concerning the first four or five lines of the Dillingham bill, recently reported in the Senate, which, as to those particular lines, is practically the same as the bill this day ordered to be reported from the Committee on Immigration of the House.

As I followed the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS], and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON], I gathered that these gentlemen were what might be termed "selectionists;" that is, in favor of immigration of a proper sort and opposed to all immigration of an improper sort. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] I would perhaps class as a "restrictionist," differing somewhat from the other three in his general ideas on the subject. Therefore, in what I have to say I will perhaps touch more directly upon the remarks of the three gentlemen who are "selectionists," than those of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], a "restrictionist." The provision to which I refer in the Dillingham bill is as follows:

SECTION 1. That there shall be levied and collected and paid a duty of $5 for each and every passenger, not a citizen of the United States or of the Dominion of Canada, not a citizen of the Republic of Cuba, or the Republic of Mexico, who shall come by steam, sail, or other vessel from any foreign port to any port within the United States, or by railway or other mode of transportation from foreign contiguous territory to the United States.

That is what is known as the "head tax" provision. The tax is paid by the steamship companies, and the two committees, that of the Senate and that of the House, are endeavoring to raise that head tax from $2, the sum at which it is now fixed, to $5.

Now, the aim of the "selectionists," as I understand it, is to get better immigrants. Some of them stated very frankly that they were opposed to immigrants from Italy and southeastern Europe; others said that their remarks apply to no particular race, but all said that they had no particular objection to number if the quality of the immigrant was all right.

Now, let us see how the $5 head tax will work out. I do not know whether it is generally understood that a $5 head tax means $5 on every man, woman, and child; that it is just the same on the nursing baby as it is on the sturdy workman; that there is no gradation, change, or difference. So here is what happens. My friends say they want to keep out the man who comes here just for a few months to earn money and then go back to some other country. A $5 head tax does not affect him at all. It simply means that he has to make arrangements not only to get the money to pay his fare across the ocean, but to pay the additional $3 which will be deducted from his first week's or month's money. You have not even caused him inconvenience. He has only himself to look out for. The difference in wages between the country from which he comes and the wages here make this up so quickly that the amount is absolutely inconsiderable so far as he is concerned, and you have not kept one of these men out. On the other hand, take what these gentlemen call the desirable classes of immigrants, the men from the northern part of Europe, for whom I have just as high respect as they, although I differ with them in their attempt to classify immigration as desirable or undesirable by countries. Take the men who come from there with families. Take the man who comes with his wife and five or six children, as these Germans, Irishmen, Finns, Swedes, Danes, and Norwegians do, day after day, into the ports of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and the other ports. Instead of meaning $5 to every one of those men it means $5 multiplied by as many as there are in his family, down to the youngest child; and instead of restricting the coming of the man who means to stay but a few months to make a little money and go back, and the single man, you have penalized the man who intends coming here with his family to make this his permanent home and abiding place. So much for that branch of it.

If there ever was a bill that should have been labeled a gift to foreign steamship companies, this is that bill. Who pays this head tax? The law says that it is a lien on the steamship, and the steamship company pays it. How does it pay it? Why, of course, in the end the money does not come out of the funds of the steamship company, but it is put on the ticket. Obviously, there can be but one price for tickets, and to-day there is but one price. So what is the result? Does the alien immigrant alone pay this head tax? Oh, no; everybody who comes across the Atlantic Ocean, first or second class or steerage, pays it to-day; either the full $2 or some portion of it; and where the Government does not get the $2—that is, where the money is paid by an American citizen returning or an alien who already has a domicile here, or anyone, except those to whom the law applies—the steamship company gets the $2, and we are legislating to raise the rate of dividend of the German and all the other foreign steamship lines, for we have only one American line of shipping on the Atlantic coast engaged in this business, that line running to Philadelphia and New York. So that is what we are going to do. There was not a steamship company came before our committee to protest, and I do not wonder. It had been advertised far and abroad that the head tax was going to be raised. That was a gift for the steamship companies to the extent of $3 on every ticket sold to other than aliens. That is all that that particular part of this much-advertised bill does. It stops nobody except the man with a wife and family.

The steamship companies! It gives them all there is in the bill. American citizens returning from abroad! It makes them pay either the full $5, or so much as the steamship companies determine that the traffic will stand of the $5, in addition to what they would otherwise pay for passage; and, above all, and more than that, this bill takes from the immigrating family $5 for every man, woman, and child of the immigrants that the gentlemen to whom I have alluded most earnestly desire. What will they do? They will do what they are doing now to some extent, only more so. Instead of taking a steamer for an American port and becoming valuable American citizens, with American opportunities for themselves and their children, they will take a British steamer to Canada or some other foreign steamer to Argentina, and we shall lose just the kind of immigrants who in the early days went out on the western prairies and everywhere and built up all of the great Middle West. Canada, that is to-day sending agents down into Minnesota and Wisconsin and paying them a premium for every American citizen that they can get to emigrate across the border over into their wheat fields, will get the kind of immigrants that these gentlemen say that they want to get here.

I intend, as to that particular provision of the bill, should it come before the House, to vote against it. I think the sober second thought of the Members here, when they study the question, will lead them along the same lines, and I believe that when that question is thoroughly considered they will come to the conclusion that the head tax is all right for this purpose—and this purpose only—to pay the expenses of the immigration service. What are the facts to-day? This $2 head tax has been in force just three years, and to-day they have paid all the expenses of immigration out of the fund raised from that $2 head tax and have a fund of over $2,000,000 as a surplus; and when I say "expenses" I include additional land and new buildings. The gentlemen who drafted the House bill were so certain that it would be a revenue-producing measure, that it would produce more money than would be necessary for the needs of the service, as to insert the provision that where the head tax produces more than two and one-half million dollars yearly the surplus shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

In other words, if this bill succeeds, we are going into the business of taxing not only the immigrant, which is bad enough, but taxing the casual visitor, for this bill applies to every alien passenger that crosses either the Atlantic or Pacific ocean, and making each of our own citizens pay $5 to some foreign steamship company. Every German that comes to investigate our great resources, every Englishman who travels in the great West is subject to this tax. Up to last year there had more Englishmen gone each year through the Yellowstone Park than there had Americans. He pays, in addition to the expenses of travel, an utterly unnecessary sum of $5. Up to this time the head tax has not been a large sum, and it has not been noticed, but the increase will be noticed and travel will be diverted. It is these annoying little things at the threshold that do divert travel.

To sum up, we do not stop a single undesirable man by the increase. We make the poor man, who has had to struggle to get here, who has money enough to start him in, go down into his slender resources and pay the Government—that does not need it—anywhere from $10 to $60 for the privilege of crossing our shore line. We accomplish nothing by it, and I hope when the bill comes before the House this head tax will be put back where it is now, where it is justified, where it simply raises money enough to cover the expense and causes no one any serious inconvenience. [Applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. I suggest now that the gentleman from Tennessee occupy the remainder of the afternoon.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BYRD].

Mr. BYRD. Mr. Chairman, considering its record, one must view with misgiving confidence the conduct of the party in power, as represented on this floor, in having supported the measure to save the people from the extortions, discriminations, and rebates by the railroads. If sincere in its protestation for public good, why has it not made an effort to rid the country of that more grievous evil—the unbridled and unconscionable trusts? Nor will the American people confide in the fidelity of the President in supporting this great Democratic policy unless he intensifies his efforts to save them from these far more destructive evils. His abortive court procedure invokes derisive contempt from both the people and the trusts, and this mockery is being accepted by many as either an approval of or a surrender to these monsters of iniquity by the party in power.

The Administration must know that the trusts are barricaded by protection; it must further know the most serious blow that could be inflicted is to repeal the protective schedules of the Dingley law. They laugh at the futile attempts to enforce the antitrust laws, but if the trust-controlled articles were put upon the free list there would be "wailing and gnashing of teeth" in their camp. It is within the power of this Congress to destroy 85 per cent of the trusts within the next twenty days, and it is "up to" our Republican friends to act now or stand branded as the champions of the most villainous iniquity of the age. The President in his early manhood drank too deeply of the political philosophy of Cobden and Bright not to be fully advised that the trusts are the fruits of protection, and his acute strenuosity in investigating public wrongs must have long since convinced him that the existing railroad abuses are largely the parasitic evils of protecton and trusts—that in the clutches of such giants as the steel, beef, and oil trusts the greatest railroads are as powerless as a private citizen, and that when they say "Come," they cometh, "Go," they goeth, or are either absorbed or subjected to a ruinous boycott. Knowing these facts and remembering that he has acquired a reputation for proverbial honesty of statesmanship, we can not account for his complete surrender to the tariff "stand-pat" policy of his party, unless it be that his quietude is inspired by the disloyalty of his party friends; too, he doubtless remembers that it took Moses many years to overcome the idolatry of the Israelites.

Mr. Chairman, I am an avowed advocate of railroad rate legislation, believing that rebates and private car lines are auxiliaries to the trusts. I voted for the Hepburn bill, and, though defective as it is, I believe its adoption will likely result in much good to the country. But to one who thinks a moment about the industrial conditions of the country, how insignificant must appear the "graft" of railroads when contrasted with the wholesale robberies of the trusts. While the railroads have increased the price of freight on lumber about 17 per cent, the lumber trust has increased the cost of the product to the home builder more than 100 per cent. While the railroads have increased the freight on shoes about one-fourth of a cent per pair from Boston to the South, the hide trust, an adjunct of the beef trust, has increased the price from 10 to 50 cents per pair within the last six months. Governor Douglas, of Massachusetts, is credited with recently saying that the duty on hides alone annually cost the people $10,000,000, of which $2,250,000 is paid to the Government and the balance of more than $7,000,000 to the hide trust. The railroads have unjustly increased the freight on agricultural implements from Chicago to the great Southwest, but the international harvester trust sell the same products to the foreign farmer for from 20 to 30 per cent less than to those at home. Since the Dingley law went into operation the railroads have doubtless largely increased the freight on iron, steel, and the manufactures thereof, but the steel trust has almost doubled the price of these products. A manufacturer of farm wagons, in explaining why he advanced prices 25 per cent, said:

> Less than two years ago the president of the great steel corporation testified that bar iron and steel could be produced at a profit for $12.50 per ton, and for steel we must pay $40, or over 200 per cent profit. The steel magnates tell us that when iron was sold at $18 per ton the price was too low and was a breeder of panics; but we all recall the fact that in 1893 the Carnegie properties were valued at less than $10,000,000, and that after five years of panic and $18 prices Mr. Carnegie sold his interests alone in these properties for $360,000,000. This was 350 per cent profit in five years, or 72 per cent annually, and in panic times, too. How long, O Lord, how long, will "the dear people" be thus fooled?

And, too, how insignificant appear the rebates on the freight on sugar when compared with the millions annually pocketed by the sugar trust; and as another evidence of the insincerity of our Republican friends, let me state that the Democrats on two different occasions within the last two years have voted almost solidly to repeal the duty on refined sugar and thereby destroy the sugar trust, while our Republican friends voted almost solidly against the proposition. But more than this, there are a cartload of bills before the Ways and Means Committee touching every phase of the tariff law, all having for their chief aim the abolition of a trust, as well as the opening of new markets for our increasing commerce, and if passed would save millions to the consumers on agricultural implements, barbed wire, shoes, vehicles, and other necessaries. But they are as dead in that committee as though interred in the Arlington Cemetery. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, what better evidence of the duplicity and arrant hypocrisy of the Republican party is wanted? It may be that their policy of crucifying the witch and sparing the devil is founded upon the lurking prejudice against the railroads for failing to "come across" as liberally as they should have done in the late Presidential campaign. Perhaps if the latter had contributed as liberally as did the trusts and the insurance companies, these Ahabs of protection might have spared their vineyards, and at this good hour their lords might have been wining and dining with the McCurdys in the courts abroad. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Our Republican friends should not conclude for a moment that by their cuttlefish antics in dealing with existing wrongs they can muddy the waters of public opinion. The people are beginning to know the real issue, the real cause of the trouble, and appreciate the insincerity of any effort to abolish the trusts without the abolition of protection. It is known in every hamlet that the steel trust, sugar trust, agricultural-implement trust, and many others are waxing strong and stronger, day by day, under the sheltering schedules of the Dingley law.

The question of the hour is, Who shall live—the people or the trusts? Who shall sway the rod of empire—the people or these monsters of protection? Whether the great agricultural industry of the South and West shall be released from these bandits of spoliation and have a free and unfettered market for their increasing crops and whether the multitude of American consumers shall continue to pay more tribute to the moguls of protection than to the support of their Government are the real issues.

The people are determined in their efforts for reform, and our Republican friends can not quell them by such pacific measures as this emasculated Hepburn bill or by sending a few petty thieves from the Post-Office Department to the penitentiary. The wage-earners want a chance to enjoy the fruits of their toil. The masses are crying for an opportunity to spend their hard earnings in the support and education of their families instead of dividing it with bandits. The 30,000,000 of our farmers, who scorn a bounty from the Government, demand the world for their market. Their broad acres are smiling with riches as soon as the Government stays the hand of the robber and removes the protective wall that isolates them from the world.

Mr. Chairman, I dare say that if the great consuming masses of the country could fully appreciate the extent of the wholesale robbery being daily perpetrated under the laws of their country, if they could know and behold the truth of the iniquities that follow in the wake of protection, there would be a political revolution the like of which has not found a place in history.

The great mass of our plain, patriotic people, having labored incessantly for a living, have never considered seriously the proposition that under trust rule every cent of duty levied under the Dingley law on any article is paid by them, whether the same is imported or made at home. Thus, if the American farmers annually purchase 1,000,000 sewing machines, of which 1,000 are imported and 999,000 made at home, then the price of the 1,000, plus the tax of from $5 to $10 each, fixes the price of the entire number manufactured at home. The tariff tax is always added to the cost of the domestic product as well as to the cost of the imported article. If it is not added to the domestic as well as the imported article, there would be no use for protection. Its sole purpose is to enable the home manufacturer to add the amount of the tariff as an extra profit to the cost of production. Otherwise no one would want protection, or a low duty would do as well as a high one. In other words, when a manufacturer demands that there shall be a duty of 45 or 50 per cent tax on the article he makes, then he is simply asking the Government to permit him to add the said amount to the cost of production, since the difference in the expense of manufacturing here and elsewhere is more than equaled by the cost of transportation from a foreign country. This seems so plain that a wayfaring man, though a fool, may see it.

Speaking of the effect of protection, Alexander Hamilton said:

> Duties of this nature evidently amount to a virtual bounty on the domestic fabrics.

To the same effect John Quincy Adams wrote:

> The duty constitutes a part of the price of the whole mass of the article in the market. It is substantially paid upon the article of domestic manufacture as well as upon that of foreign production. Upon one it is a bounty, upon the other a burden, and the repeal of the tax must operate as an equivalent reduction of the price of the article, whether foreign or domestic.

If the duty was regarded by the ablest friends of protection as a bounty to the manufacturer, and paid by the consumer, when there were no trusts, how should it now be considered when every vestige of domestic competition is destroyed?

Mr. Chairman, I contend that, separated by thousands of miles from all formidable competition and having more convenient raw material than any other nation, we can compete with any country in the manufacture of almost any article. I contend, further, that the entire tariff tax, amounting to not less than an average of 48 per cent on all kinds of manufactures, is a subsidy to the manufacturers, if taken; and I contend, further, that under the trust rule it is accepted and passed as a surplus profit into the coffers of the trusts. In these contentions I believe that I am sustained by the intelligent judgment of the American people, if not by the Republican wizards of this House.

In this connection let me read you a table showing the total amount of four leading products imported into the United States in 1905, together with the actual per cent rate of duty paid and amount received by the Government:

Articles.	Value.	Duty.	Ad valorem rate.
			Per ct.
Iron and steel products	$22,044,937	$8,422,237	38
Meat products	726,664	254,332	35
Agricultural implements	13,876	2,775	20
Glass and glassware	5,776,669	3,311,715	57

The value of these imports plus the cost of transportation and plus the duty collected not only fixed their prices in this market, but also the prices of all like domestic products consumed. There is no difference in market price of an imported and non-imported article of like class. "A dress suit that cost $22 in Berlin, plus a $19 import duty, could not be duplicated out of domestic goods of like kind in this city for less than $40," says a substantial citizen. Schwab, while at the head of the steel trust, wrote his man Frick a few years ago that, while steel rails sold here for $28 a ton, he could deliver them in England for $16 and make $4 profit. It is a well-known fact that the beef trust sells meat 25 per cent higher in Buffalo than just across the line in Canada. The net profits of American steel industry alone for 1905 amounted to $119,850,282. The Canadian tariff commission says:

> Makers of thrashing machines, feeders, stackers, weighers, baggers, and portable farm engines in the United States are selling these things in Canada at 35 per cent below American prices. They say that the discounts are that much below what any jobber can obtain them for in the United States, and that a trade has been built up which amounts to $750,000 a year.

These facts not only verify the doctrine of Hamilton and Adams, but demonstrate to every impartial mind that the entire duty is taxed against the consumer, that on the imported article going to the Government and on the domestic article to the trusts, which are born of protection and sired by the Republican party.

Thus there are 6,000,000 farms in the United States, and granting that each consumes 200 pounds of domestic wire, valued at 4 cents per pound, we find they consume 1,200,000,000 pounds, costing $48,000,000; and applying the principle just enunciated we find that 42 per cent of the $48,000,000, or $20,000,000, is tariff profit to the trusts. The truth of this is apparent.

Let us apply this doctrine to a few of the general schedules of the Dingley law and note the results. By adding 15 per cent increase to the amount shown by the census report for 1900, we find that in 1905 the total iron and steel products manufactured in the United States amounted to $1,131,395,205, of which $134,727,221 was exported, leaving for home consumption the amount of $996,667,984. Of this amount 38 per cent, or approximately $378,000,000, was tax levied for the trust, while the Government on like products imported for the same year received only $8,472,237, as is shown by the table just read.

In the same year and in the same manner we find that our total manufactured meat products amounted to $1,000,000,000, being $745,567,433 in 1900, of which was exported the amount of $169,990,685, leaving $830,000,315 for home consumption. Of this amount 35 per cent, or quite $290,000,000, was tariff bounty to the meat trust, while the Government, as per the table read, received a tax on the imported product of only $254,332. The average duty of 35 per cent is a modest estimate, since the tax is 2 cents a pound on fresh meats, 5 cents on hams and bacon, and 35 per cent on extracts of meat.

Likewise in 1905 we manufactured agricultural implements to the amount of $126,000,000, of which we exported $29,721,741, leaving $96,278,259 for the home market. Of this 20 per cent, or about $19,000,000, was tariff to the trust, while the Government on like imported articles received only $2,775, the amount imported being $13,876.

It is estimated that in 1905 we produced about $175,000,000 of glass and glassware and exported $2,252,709, leaving for the domestic market $192,747,291, of which 57 per cent, or more than $86,000,000, is tax profit pure and simple.

In the same manner, on scores of other articles of everyday consumption, such as sugar, leather products, woolen goods, hats, cutlery, sewing machines, etc., it can be shown that, under the Dingley trust reign, the consumers are paying many times more to the trusts than to the Government. Collecting the facts I have just stated, we find that in 1905 the American consumers on four leading articles of everyday consumption were taxed by the Dingley law $773,000,000 for the trusts, while only $14,506,013 for their Government, as is shown by this table:

Articles.	To the Government.	To the trusts.
Iron and steel products	$8,472,237	$378,000,000
Meat products	254,332	290,000,000
Agricultural implements	2,775	19,000,000
Glass and glassware	5,776,669	86,000,000
Total	14,506,013	773,000,000

Mr. Chairman, this is a remarkable disclosure indeed, but it is nevertheless true. These estimates are based upon the rate of duty collected on the class of articles imported, while there are many articles in the schedules bearing a much higher duty that are not imported. If anyone doubts the truth of these figures let him go in the markets and buy a beefsteak, a window sash, a mowing machine, a roll of steel wire, and then have the same order duplicated in any free market. I dare say that there are 80,000,000 of American consumers who are willing to attest the truth of this proposition.

Let us present this robbery in another phase. A purchaser going into the markets to buy a bill of goods, places at least one-third of his money to the credit of the trusts. The farmer buying a bill of necessaries in the home market pays the trusts the same tax he would have to pay the Government were he to buy them in England and bring them to this country. We submit the following, showing the approximate amount of "graft" for the trust on a modest bill of domestic merchandise, estimating the same according to the actual amount of tax paid on like products imported in 1905:

Articles.	Total cost.	Trust tax.
Sewing machine	$25.00	$7.00
Disk harrow	40.00	11.00
Vehicle	50.00	8.33
Set of harness	30.00	8.26
Worsted suit	20.00	9.46
Glass, door, and window panels	50.00	31.80
3 barrels sugar	15.00	4.62
Total	230.00	80.47

The same bill of goods, made at the same time, out of the same material and in the same factories, is sold to foreigners at $80.57 less than at home, and still the farmer votes the Republican ticket. I never think of protection and the farmer that I am not reminded of Macklin's definition of law, when he said: "It is a sort of hocus-pocus science, that smiles in yer face while it picks yer pockets."

But, sir, there is one pertinent inquiry in this connection that I desire to make. How can your party face the farmers of the West in defense of a policy that taxes them $19,000,000 for the trusts while only $2,775 for their Government? Or, how are you to stand before the 80,000,000 of our meat consumers, who are being annually robbed under your coveted policy of $290,000,000? If they knew, as we know, your party would be crying for the mountains to fall upon it to hide its iniquity.

A few days ago I introduced a bill to place all kinds of manufactured meat products on the free list, and if this Congress will pass it, not only will the beef trust be destroyed, but millions will be blessed. Canada has a meat surplus of $31,000,000; Argentina, $27,000,000; New Zealand, $19,000,000, and Australia $11,000,000, as well as other countries many millions, all ready to come into our market and destroy the trust, if you will but pass this bill. Now, what are you going to do—stand by the people or the trust?

Charles Edward Russell, in his valuable work on the beef trust, says it annually extracts from the railroads $25,000,000 in rebates. The rate bill is intended to stop this iniquity. Now, by passing this bill and cutting off the multiplied millions of tariff "graft," this monster of criminal aggression will be shorn of its gory locks. In the brief period of ten days you can accomplish more good than can the courts in a century. Adopt this measure and not only will the trust be destroyed, but millions of the poor who have not tasted this life-giving food for months will waft your praises to heaven.

Mr. Chairman, in view of these appalling abuses of protection we should send a message of warning to the American people. It should be proclaimed in every hamlet that the time has arrived in the life of this Republic when under the law a private citizen is taxed many times more to enrich the trusts than to support his Government. Every toiling farmer should be impressed with the truth of the statement that his class is taxed annually a hundred times more for the trusts than for the Government on the implements of husbandry; and the whole people should know that their annual tribute to the beef trust alone is nearly equal to the total expenditures of the Government. Impart these facts as we know them, and I dare say there will be a political panic in November.

Mr. GREENE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BYRD. Yes, sir.

Mr. GREENE. What is the state of industry in Mississippi to-day, prosperous or not?

Mr. BYRD. Everything is prosperous, but nothing depending on protection.

Mr. GREENE. Are they very prosperous?

Mr. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. GREENE. What was the state of industry under the Wilson bill?

Mr. BYRD. My brother, if you will sit in that chair and listen until I get through I will tell you.

Mr. GREENE. Will not the gentleman answer what was the state of industry during the life of the Wilson bill?

Mr. BYRD. Well, not as bad as in 1873, when the Republicans had control.

Mr. GREENE. Never mind that; I ask you what was the state of industry under the Wilson bill?

Mr. BYRD. About as good as at any other time back to 1860, when the Republican reign began.

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BYRD. Only a question.

Mr. POU. I would like to inquire if the paralyzed conditions did not exist in foreign countries at that time as well as in the United States?

Mr. BYRD. Yes; that is all in my speech, and I do not want to anticipate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman will pardon me, I want to suggest in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] that the price of cotton in Mississippi was lower under the first McKinley Administration than it has ever been in the history of the country.

Mr. BYRD. Protection is binding the Government and the trusts in enduring wedlock, and the Republican party is the high priest officiating at the nuptial debauchery. This unhallowed union reminds one of that ancient Jew, of reasonable respectability, who united his destiny with the princess of devils—Jezabel. But these unholy bonds must be dissolved; the time for separation is at hand; the unforgiving sin has been committed. Appeals to the courts will not suffice; such punishment is regarded by the trusts as the boy considers the brief, stinging "flogging" of his affectionate father. If the party in power really desires their destruction, if it really craves consternation in their ranks, immediately sever their life-giving artery—protection. [Applause.]

I am aware that the power of taxation for legitimate purposes is inherent in all governments, that revenue is the lifeblood of organized society, and that often in the administration of this high function of government grevious wrongs have been committed in all ages and in all countries. But surely not elsewhere in the realms of civilization can be found a parallel for such prostitution of the taxing power as under the Dingley law. Other nations impose duties, but not for the sole purpose of fostering criminals. By a system of impressment the Sultan of Turkey may appropriate the entire estate of his subject even to support his lusty harem, but the priest-ridden heathen is taught that his sacrifice is for the public good. Ours is a system of legalized impressment by which private property is subjected, not for public weal but private greed. The lustful Oriental inflicts his wrong for public vice—ours is for private, and oftimes bacchanalian debauchery; and while the wrongs of the one may be forgotten in blissful ignorance, the tyrannies of the other will endure as long as the fire of just resentment burns in a patriotic heart. [Applause.]

Sir, in answer to those who refer to free oil and the Standard Oil trust to disprove the contention that protection is the author of these evils, I want to say that that monster of finance is not more dependent on oil than on protected industries for its wonderful success. It has reached out and drawn into its hideous fold many of our most highly protected enterprises. The Evening Times a few days ago gave a long list of protected industries, representing hundreds of millions of dollars, controlled by the Standard Oil people. Nor do we admit that oil and petroleum are unprotected. It is true that they are on the free list, but with this proviso:

That if there be imported into the United States crude petroleum or the products of crude petroleum produced in any country which imposes a duty on petroleum or its products exported from the United States, there shall, in such cases, be levied, paid, and collected a duty upon said crude petroleum or its products so imported equal to the duty imposed by such country.

Russia, our only competitor in the export of oil, having protected her product by a heavy duty against all countries, is excluded from our markets by this act, and with the Russian products outlawed the trust has no opposition from any quarter. Indeed this is a very artful manner of providing for this baby industry by its friends. But "the ox knoweth his owner and the ass his master's crib." [Applause.]

A trust lives only when competition dies, and it is not a trust until all competitors are destroyed or controlled. Anything that limits the number or domain of independent industries facilitates trust formation, and if it is difficult to destroy competition in a county it is more so in a State, still more so in the nation, and infinitely more so in the world. This being true, and protection having destroyed foreign competition, it follows as a logical sequence that this is an inviting field to be exploited by those strong enough to overcome domestic competition. The princely bounties offered intensify industrial effort to such an extent that our manufacturers, like ravenous wolves over the carcass of the plains, contest with each other for the lion's share of the booty, destroying the weak to satisfy gourmandized greed. If this alluring bequest is not the real trouble, why should this be such a coveted home for the trusts? Why do they not abound in Mexico and Canada? Or why did they not infest this country in the days when this bounty was not so inviting? The unlawful centralization of capital has intensified in the same ratio that tariff profits have increased, and the trusts will be destroyed to the same extent that these emoluments are diminished. It may be true that a few might survive the wreck of tariff reformation, but they would be emasculated of all danger; would be like the hideous, writhing serpent with its poisonous fangs extracted—might strike, but do no harm. In that event the consumers would have the open markets of the world as a protecting shield from the criminal extortions at home.

Mr. Chairman, having at the last session submitted a few remarks touching the effect of protection on our foreign markets, I will not again discuss it more than to say that in retaliation of our trust-breeding policy Canada, China, England, and Germany are rapidly boycotting our products. Canada is passing her antidumping laws, and our outlawed goods are rotting in the warehouses of China. England is largely buying her great food supply from Argentina, Canada, Denmark, the Netherlands, and elsewhere, and Germany has grown so vindictive in her retaliating war policy as to necessitate the intervention of our State Department to hold her in abeyance for even twelve months. Under her new tariff American meat products are completely excluded from that market. I wonder what the meat producers of the West will think of protection and the trusts when they learn that this rich market, which in 1905 consumed $72,000,000 of their products, will soon be closed to them, and when they learn from a bulletin just published by the Agricultural Department that their product is being rapidly driven from Great Britain, the greatest meat market of the world; that there has been no increase in the importation into that country from the United States since 1895, while from Canada and Denmark it has doubled, and from Argentina it has increased fourfold. In the item of fresh beef alone England's annual imports from the United States in the same time have declined from 75 to 55 per cent, and from Argentina have increased from 2 to 36 per cent. Destroy protection and the trusts and you will end the Chamberlain crusade against American products in that rich market.

Some months ago the New York Chamber of Commerce sent out a circular letter warning the country of the dangers threatening our foreign trade, from which I read the following:

It is of the utmost importance that the National Government be informed in no uncertain terms of the demand of the business community that our foreign trade be extended and enlarged by improved commercial relations with the countries of Europe, so that the imminent danger of a disastrous tariff war of retaliation may be avoided, and we would therefore urge you to present your views on this subject to the President of the United States and his advisers, and also to the Senators and Congressmen from your State. It is necessary that this important question, which means either life and growth or practical extinction to a large part of our valuable export trade, should be thoroughly agitated. To this end the prompt, thorough, and effective support of all the commercial organizations of the country is imperatively demanded.

Again, permit me to say that the future of the South is vitally interested in the revocation of this market-destroying policy. She is absolutely dependent on foreign consumption of her great staple product. Anything limiting the extent of her market is destructive to her prosperity. In 1895 foreign countries took our cotton, 4,870,451 bales, at 5 cents per pound, and in 1905 they took about 8,000,000 bales, at from 8 to 12 cents per pound. Our sales of raw cotton to Japan and China from 1901 to 1905 have increased from 86,243 to 332,243 bales.

In 1895 our total exports of cotton cloths amounted to 694,500,715 yards, of which 474,909,500 yards went to China alone. She paid for this product $27,761,095, while in 1903 she took only 277,671,500 yards, valued at $13,685,860, having more than doubled in three years. These figures are remarkable indeed when we consider for a moment that little more than a decade ago our cotton products were not noted in the statistics from that country. At this ratio of increase China alone will, in less than ten years, consume one-third of our cotton products. She is the greatest prospective cotton market of the world, being more densely populated and just emerging from a state of semi-barbarism, she has wonderful trade advantages for those who are judicious enough to embrace them. It is our candid opinion that an unfettered market with that country will enrich not only the South, but the cotton factory districts of New England; and, in view of this fact, it is strange indeed how anyone living in that section can affiliate with a party whose policy tends to isolate them from the richest market of the world.

But can we have any assurance of these promised riches from China with her 400,000,000 people? Have we not by our misguided legislation invoked a ruinous boycott to American commerce, if not civil war with that country? Instead of marshaling our armies upon the shores of China, why not modify our tariff schedule and repeal the discriminating features of the Chinese exclusion law, or why not apply its provisions to like characters from other countries, thereby removing its offending features, and save the South its greatest market, as well as the nation from threatened war? Instead of spending this session on minor measures, why not do something that will make half of New England and all of the South sing our praises? To the South peace with China means wealth; war means ruin.

But, just in this connection, I want to say that all praise is due the President for recently sending special trade agents to South America, China, and elsewhere. The reports of two of these, Messrs. Crist and Burrell, just issued by the Bureau of Commerce and Labor, is a revelation on the possibilities of our trade with China, and should be read by every citizen.

Permit me to read from them a few brief excerpts touching the cotton possibilities in China:

American manufactures, especially of cotton goods, have a wonderful opportunity in China. The territory for exploiting is practically a limitless one. * * * With the establishment here of more Americans in the foreign trade the use of various cotton goods should increase greatly and all competition should be overcome. * * * Out of a total value of cotton piece goods sold in this (Tientsin) market during 1904 of over $6,500,000, these lines represent the great bulk, and approximately two-thirds of the sum stated are supplied by Manchester mills from cotton obtained in America, shipped across the Atlantic Ocean, woven into cloth, and shipped to northern China. That a greatly increased share of this as well as of the entire Chinese market can be won by American manufacturers and held against all competitors there is not the slightest doubt. * * * The offtake from the Shanghai market, where virtually the entire import is centered, has grown from a total in 1895 of 1,647,000 pieces of all descriptions of American goods to a total in 1904 of 8,200,000 pieces, in round numbers. It is estimated that this year fully 10,000,000 pieces of cotton goods have been imported, all indicating a most gratifying increase in the exportation of American piece goods to this market. * * * The boycott caused a complete stagnation of business, and the enormous quantity of goods ordered for speculative purposes also affected the situation. Extensive orders had been placed in due time, shipments were made, and cargo after cargo of piece goods arrived in Shanghai, only to be consigned to the warehouses or godowns.

Mr. Chairman, this disastrous boycott of American goods by China is not the only result of the discriminating features of the Chinese-exclusion law, but is largely caused by the maladministration of that law. Hon. John W. Foster, once a Cabinet officer and the very best authority on the subject, recently said:

The Chinese boycott of American goods is a striking evidence of an awakening spirit of resentment in the great Empire against the injustice and aggression of foreign countries. * * * The treatment which the Chinese residents have received at the hands of hoodlums, ruffians, race haters, and mobs has been a disgrace to our civilization; but that has not been so shameful as their treatment by the officials of Federal and local governments.

In describing a recent raid against the Chinese by Federal officers in Boston, he says:

Every Chinese who did not at once produce his certificate of residence was taken in charge, and the unfortunate ones were rushed off to the Federal building without further ceremony. * * * In the raid no mercy was shown by the Government officials. The frightened Chinese who had sought to escape were dragged from their hiding places and stowed like cattle upon wagons or other vehicles to be conveyed to the designated place of detention. On one of those wagons or trucks from seventy to eighty persons were thrown, and soon after it moved it was overturned. A scene of indescribable confusion followed, in which the shrieks of those attempting to escape mingled with the groans of those who were injured.

But leaving this part of my subject let me say that the average duty on all protected articles under the Dingley law is about 48 per cent, and since at least 80 per cent of our manufactured products are controlled by the trust for the sole purpose of appropriating all the tariff bounty, that counting only 20 per cent of the value of our entire manufactured products as tariff tax, we have an alarming result. In 1900 our total manufactured products amounted to $8,370,000,000, and for 1905 it is estimated at not less than $9,000,000,000. Of this amount we exported $548,607,975, leaving a balance of $8,456,392,025 for home consumption, on which the American consumer paid a tax at this conservative rate of about $1,691,278,405 to the trust, while in the same year they paid less than one-half of this amount to support the Government. But some will contend that this amount is not added. If not, why not? The real truth is, more is added, when we consider that there are more than a hundred articles controlled by the trust on which the tax is more than 100 per cent.

In this connection there is another thought worthy of consideration. If we will deduct the tariff value, together with the $2,000,000,000 of raw farm products that enter into manufactures, we will find that the net value of the entire factory products is $5,308,721,595, while that of the farm is $6,415,000,000. In the fiscal year 1905 the exports from the American farm amounted to $820,863,405, and from the factory $543,607,975. These figures show conclusively that the farm is our greatest wealth-producing industry, yet it is a remarkable fact that rural wealth has not increased in the same proportion as that of the factory centers, the cities, as will appear from the following table, from 1860 to 1900:

1860	$8,180,000,000	$7,980,000,000
1880	31,538,000,000	12,104,000,000
1900	73,786,000,000	20,514,000,000

What a remarkable difference would have been in this table if the one had not been subsidized with a bounty of from one-half to one billion dollars annually almost exclusively at the expense of the other. Protection is the cause of the disparity of these figures. Upon what principle of economic philosophy can such a policy be predicated; or where can a logical reason be found for destroying the market for a greater industry in order that a smaller one may thrive on monopoly? Or, in this Union of equal States, how can you justify pauperizing one to enrich another? Such a policy is abhorrent to every principle of political economy, and will ultimately destroy the Republic unless checked.

Mr. Chairman, our Republican friends scorn the idea of ridding the country of this iniquity, their leader having announced a few days ago that there would be no tariff legislation in the Fifty-ninth Congress. By their inaction they acknowledge to the world that favoritism in the administration of Republican government is a virtue; that legalized robbery is a benediction; that sectionalism is the spirit of the Constitution, and that anarchy and agrarianism are "rather to be chosen" than Democracy and patriotism.

But it is contended that we must have protection for revenue; if not for this, for fostering American industries; if not for this, to protect our labor; if not for this, for building up home markets for our farmers; and if not for this, for the unacknowledged purpose of providing an inexhaustible resource from whence to draw campaign funds, and, however insidiously wrong it may appear, the latter is the more sensible purpose, since the others vanish in the sunlight of reason.

Revenue is paid on the imported article and not the domestic. High duties prevent importation and destroy revenue, while low duties encourage importation and increase revenue. In 1904, manufactures of wool imported, with a duty of 92 per cent, paid the Government $16,000,000, while 1896, like imports, with a duty of 47 per cent, paid $23,000,000. Hence, as the tax increases the revenue decreases.

It is the protective and not the revenue schedules of the tariff law against which the country so seriously complains. A revenue tariff is a duty levied for revenue with incidental protection to legitimate American industries, and a protection tariff is a duty levied for the benefit of the trust with incidental emoluments to the Government. In other words, protection gives all or much more to the trusts than to the Government. When the tax is so high as to practically prevent the importation of the article taxed, then the trusts get the loaf and the Government the crumbs. Such are the schedules of the Dingley law, imposing more than a billion dollars annually on our consumers for the trust and manufacturers, while giving the Government less than one-half that amount. Hence it follows that duties levied for revenue only is the only honest system of tariff taxation.

Protection was never intended for more than a temporary aid to our struggling industries by the fathers of the policy. Senator LODGE, in his splendid biography of Alexander Hamilton, who was the founder as well as the ablest exponent of the doctrine, says Hamilton took "substantially the same ground as Mill in his Political Economy that protection for nascent industries in order to remove the obstacles of starting is wise and proper." And Hamilton himself justifies it to abate "the fear of want of success in untried enterprises, the intrinsic difficulties of first essays."

Hamilton, Clay, Webster, and Calhoun, the ablest in the litany of American statesmen, all advocated moderate protection when our infant industries were struggling in the wilds of a new country, and when England, the greatest manufacturing country in the world, with that malice born of unsuccessful war, was trying to destroy them. But what would they now say could they behold the present prostitution of their cherished policy, or what would be their consternation could they behold our "nascent industries" struggling for existence with the Herculean giants of Dingleyism—the trusts?

The doctrine of protecting infant industries from "the obstacles of starting" is as dead as its illustrious founder. As administered by the "latter-day saints" of the creed, it paralyzes legitimate industrial effort by fostered vandalism. It upbuilds irrepressible trusts to crush them. Bankruptcy and ruin is the reward of every business enterprise falling into their clutches. A poor man might as well sink his hard earnings in the "deep blue sea" as to embark in almost any business enterprise. Unless a "captain of finance" he is barred from the "pursuit of happiness" in many legitimate avocations. Consequently our capital is seeking investment abroad. Nearly six millions have gone to Mexico, two millions to Cuba and Canada each, and vast sums to South America and Hawaii—so says a high governmental official. There is being prepared in the Census Department a bulletin showing that the number of industrial enterprises are rapidly decreasing. All minor industries that are not absorbed are being destroyed to make clear the highway of plunder. Sir, the protection given "nascent industries" by the Dingley law is like that given by the hungry lion to the weaker denizens of the forest, or that the ravenous eagle gives the defenseless lamb it swoops down upon and bears away to the mountain crag for a dainty meal. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That protection helps American labor is likewise untenable. If one-half heard from the other side about the "compensating wage" were true, every industrial artisan could rear his family in affluence rather than in poverty and vice, as is true in many industrial centers. The laborers for nonprotected industries own more homes and are more contented and happy than any other laboring class. If anyone doubts this let him consult the railroads, construction companies, building contractors, and the farm laborers of the South and the West. From the humble negro plowman to the skilled mechanic, their wages have in many sections increased from 50 to 100 per cent since 1900. The average yearly wages of railroad employees throughout the country in 1900 was $595, while the steel industry, protected by millions of tariff "graft," paid only $520, and the manufacturing wool and worsted industries of Massachusetts, which is also protected to the extent of millions of tariff profit, in 1903 only paid from $422 to $490 to laborers. Mr. Havemeyer before the Industrial Commission said the wages paid by the sugar trust was $1.35 to $1.50 per day of from eight to twelve hours, and the employees were required to work in a heat of from 90° to 110°. Deduct from this the daily cost of their food and lodging in a crowded city and how much will their wives and children receive? Poor, deluded creatures. To all such I would say: "Take up thy bed and walk" to the sunny South, where the Lord and justice reign. Remove your children from that dismal tenement of vice and crime to where there is no hunger and where sympathy rides the sunbeam and charity blooms with the wild flower, and where they can grow up to vigorous manhood and virtuous womanhood.

In further refutation of this fallacious contention, permit me to say that the strikes—the torch—the rifle—yea, incipient anarchy, have been quite as available as Dingleyism in raising wages. The coal miners have inaugurated the most stupendous strike of the age. Why do they strike? Why do they not look to protection for satisfactory wages? It gives the operators a bounty of 60 cents a ton on coal, which, according to good authority, pays quite all the expense of mining. In other words, the Government goes down into the bowels of the earth and brings forth the product practically as a free offering to the operator, and why do they not divide this bounty with the miners and save the bloodshed and misery of a strike?

From a report of the Census Bureau, showing the increase of wages per hour, from 1890 to 1903, we find that wages in four protected industries have increased less than in nonprotected industries.

	Per cent.
PROTECTED.
Boiler makers	0.02
Iron molders	.04
Machinists	.02
Blacksmiths	.02
NONPROTECTED.
Bricklayers	.11
Hod carriers	.06

There may be some truth in the statement that the wages of industrial laborers have advanced 20 or 25 per cent since the enactment of the Dingley law, but what does this profit the wage-earner, since it costs 40 per cent more to live than in 1897? The average American laborer does not work for stocks, bonds, or gold, but for food and raiment for wife and children. Hence his dollar-a-day wage in 1897 was more than his $1.25 of to-day. Then he purchased beef at 10 cents a pound, now he pays the trusts 18 cents; his shoes at 90 cents, now at $1.35; his worsted suit at $7, now $10; his hat at $1, now $1.35; his sewing machine at $12, now $20; and so on through the schedule of the necessaries. If a laborer spends all of his wages for necessaries, advanced in price 40 per cent, while his earnings have only increased 25 per cent, then according to the rules of common sense he is being surely impoverished. What good doth it do a man to pay him a dollar and the next breath rob him of it?

But there is another fact that belies this pretended panacea for the laborer. The Commissioner of Labor, in his 1903 report, shows that the less number of people owned their homes in the highly protected sections than elsewhere in the Union. Listen to the following, showing the per cent that own homes and the per cent that live in rented homes, to wit:

Section.	Rented homes.	Owned homes.
	Per ct.	Per ct.
North Atlantic States	86.66	13.34
South Atlantic States	80.44	19.56
North Central States	72.44	27.56
South Central States	79.20	20.80
Western States	69.03	30.97

These figures tell the story of the laborer's degradation and the fallacy of protection for his benefit with more eloquence than human lips can utter. After the highest system of protection known to the world for forty years, we find more homeless people in the protected North Atlantic States than in the practically nonprotected Southern States; and, too, it must not be overlooked that the civil war left that section almost as bare as Sahara and with millions of pauperized negroes to care for. What has gone with the multiplied millions from protection that like manna from heaven has annually fallen on that section? Why should anyone dare cringe from shivering winds or the pangs of hunger? If you will give the South one-half that bounty, no one will ever again say in all that section that he "hath not where to lay his head." But the per capita of wealth of the Northern States is many times that of the Southern States, and "thereby hangs a tale" that explains it all. If you will put Carnegie and Havemeyer and others on the witness stand and probe them for the truth—ask them who created their wealth; ask them how much of the tariff steal they gave their employees; ask them why they can build mansions on the Scottish lakes while their employees can not provide huts in the mountains of Pennsylvania; ask them why before Dingleyism their laborers received 11 per cent more of the wealth created by their labor than now—ask these questions, and if truthful answers are given the theory that protection is the friend of labor will be forever damned. One must be an imbecile who fails to observe that if protection is intended for the laboring man he has been woefully robbed.

The millions being spent subsidizing libraries and buying passports to heaven are largely the legitimate fruits of the sweat and blood of labor. Now, sir, if your party is indeed and in truth the real friend of labor, why do you not devise some means to prevent this bounty of protection from being stolen by the millionaires while in transit to the laborers? I dare say that if you will give to the half million striking miners even one-half the 60 cents a ton bounty on coal that they will return to work and strike no more.

When England abandoned protection, the wages of her laborers increased 40 per cent in a few years, says John Bright. Another said, "the laboring people of Great Britain are 30 per cent better fed, 40 per cent better clothed, 50 per cent better housed, and 100 per cent better educated than when England had a protective tariff." This is easily explained. When she opened her doors to the world, she at once became the world's greatest seller, and the demand for her products increased far more rapidly than she could supply them. Hence there was a greater demand for labor and higher wages followed. This would inevitably be the result in America were protection abandoned. We have a growing surplus of almost everything, and it must be apparent to everyone that as it increases the demand for and price of labor will decrease. Our congested home market is oversupplied with the fruits of labor. We need a wider market. There are twenty-five persons beyond the sea to consume our products where there is but one at home. Open the barred doors of the world by unlocking our own, and the increasing demand for our products will take care of three laborers while protection half starves one. [Applause.]

Sir, it must be apparent to every observer that trust-breeding protection, instead of building up, is destructive to the home market of the farmer. The trusts not only fix the price of the manufactured article, but of the raw material also. The prices for a year ahead is already fixed on his tobacco, cattle, hogs, sheep, hemp, poultry, hide, and many other products. They fix the prices and the farmer must submit. The great staples—cotton and grain—being dependent on a foreign market for consumption, are beyond the price-fixing power of the trust, and consequently have been higher than for years. Listen to the reading of a few lines from a well-known writer about the character of market protection and the beef trust as given the western farmers:

Being now the only buyer of cattle and the only seller of meat, the trust began a series of thoughtful operations that have reached from every farmer to every dinner table and taken tribute all the way. It put down the average price of medium cattle from $6 a hundredweight in September, 1899, to $4.50 in March, 1904, and in the same period it put up the retail prices of dressed meat about 20 per cent. It raked off profits at every stage of the decline of the price of cattle and at every stage of the ascent of the price of meat. It advanced the prices of its fertilizer and offal products. It reached the producer and it racked the consumer and stood resolutely between them, gathering toll from each. It advanced day by day further into the field of production and day by day laid hold upon new victims. It disclosed gradually a gigantic plan to control the price of every edible thing grown in this country, and to control it for its own dividends.

Let me here read you a table showing the manner in which the trust has advanced the price of meat to the 3,000,000 of people in New York City since 1900:

Article.		October 21, 1900.	April 28, 1905.
Porterhouse steak	per pound	$0.20	$0.28
Sirloin steak	do	.16	.24
Chuck steak	do	.08	.12½
Prime rib roast	do	.18	.24
Veal cutlets	do	.18	.25
Leg of mutton	do	.10	.14
Soup meat	do	.08	.12
Ham, best grade	do	.12	.18
Bacon, canned, rindless	do	.20	.28

Now, on the other hand, let me show you from the following table that the farmers' steers have not increased in price in Chicago since 1899. It is taken from the Weekly Live Stock Report:

Yearly average.	1,350 to 1,500 pounds.	1,200 to 1,350 pounds.	1,050 to 1,200 pounds.
1905	$5.50	$5.05	$4.55
1904	5.45	4.95	4.45
1903	5.05	4.80	4.45
1902	6.80	6.25	5.65
1901	5.65	5.25	4.85
1900	5.40	5.15	4.90
1899	5.55	5.25	4.95

If the home-market theory of protection is true, then we have stopped far short of the good that might be derived by extending this doctrine to the States, and even down to the counties. Why not let each State provide a home market by passing a Dingley law? But what would become of New England if the other States were to enact a Dingley law against her products, or what would Pennsylvania do if they were to invoke the same protection she demands for her iron and steel? Texas has oil field enough to bring her fabulous riches if permitted to erect a Dingley schedule against the Standard Oil trust. Your party cries out for an open market with all the States, yet denies the same privilege with all the world. If the freedom of commerce between the States is the correct economic policy, then as a logical conclusion it follows that a similar policy with all the consuming nations of the earth is the correct one, and especially is this true since we have much to sell and little to buy.

But, sir, the most fallacious reason yet offered in defense of protection is that it brought the unparalleled prosperity that has swept over many sections of the country for the past five or six years. If this is true, why have the unprotected sections been the more prosperous, and why has this benediction not reached us long ago? Have we not had this policy for forty-five years, and have we not during that time realized the most destructive panics?

We have heard some labored speeches try to assimilate protection and prosperity, but their logic is not above the philosophy of a Mississippi darky, who believes the world is flat and does not extend beyond the limits of his vision. Every intelligent man well knows that existing prosperity is not limited to any section or any country. It is sweeping over the world. No such business activity has hitherto been known in Canada, Mexico, Argentina, Cape Colony, Germany, and many other European countries. Indeed, other countries have in many respects within the last few years been even more prosperous than the United States. Land values in Canada and parts of Mexico have since 1900 doubled in value; and exports, which are always a sure index to a nation's prosperity, have increased far more in many other countries than in the United States. Here is a table from a report of the Commerce and Labor Department, showing the increase of exports by nations since 1896:

United States	88
Japan	173
Argentina	159
Mexico	122
Bulgaria	116
Cape of Good Hope	89
Norway	87
British India	82
Australia	78
Egypt	74

Now, we know that the defenders of protection have the assumption of an Egyptian god, but I hardly think they will have the temerity to contend that beneficent effects of Dingleyism has showered wealth on far-away Argentina, in the Cape of Good Hope, or in the far-away Australia. I know the Republican party can murder heathens by the "six hundred," or almost repeal the Lord's Prayer, under the iron-clad rules of this House, but I do not think they can compass the world's prosperity with their policy. Nor do I think they can expand its virtues so as to make it the cause of England, Japan, and Russia buying war supplies from the granaries of the West, or to make it the reason for the price of cotton advancing in Liverpool, wheat in London, and meat at Hamburg. No, Mr. Chairman, the present wave of prosperity is but the same as that which has swept over the greater part of the world during the past few years. Other countries, being prosperous, have consumed millions of dollars more of our products in the last few years than ever before, and we have prospered. The $800,000,000 of cotton and food products we are annually sending the prosperous world, and not Dingleyism, is booming this country. "All the gold mineral in the world in the last four hundred years could not purchase the farm crops of the last two years," recently wrote a great man, and if all obstructions are removed from our foreign markets the farm will continue to take care of our national wealth. The real cause of this world-wide prosperity is difficult to explain, unless it be attributed to the unprecedented increase in gold production and to the immense amount expended by England, Japan, and Russia in recent wars.

Every dollar that is dug out of the earth not only intensifies business, but adds that much additional wealth to the world, and every dollar spent in war naturally drifts to those countries buying the sinews of war. England in the Boer war expended about $775,000,000, and Japan and Russia each far more than this amount, which largely drifted to the producing nations, and, too, there has been an unprecedented acceleration in the production of gold in the last decade. Since 1850 the world's annual production of this metal has increased from $16,000,000 to $375,000,000. Since 1897 the amount has increased from $128,000,000, as is shown by the following table from the New York Herald:

1898	286,879,700
1899	306,724,100
1900	254,576,300
1901	260,992,900
1902	296,048,800
1903	325,527,200
1905 (estimated)	375,000,000

Mr. Chairman, it must be the irresistible judgment of every impartial observer that the existing policy of protection is not only without a virtue, but is a menace to that justice and equality involved in the spirit of the Constitution, and is rapidly breeding the leprosy of national deterioration. It is the verdict of universal history that wealth gives strength to a nation only when distributed with approximate equality among its subjects. Extreme poverty and massive riches alike breed the germs of national disease. Paupers and millionaires do not affiliate. One gravitates to the hovels of ignorance and anarchy and the other to the palaces of debauchery and moral death. One wields the sword of death-dealing vengeance, the other plunders with insatiable rapacity, and alike they murder patriotism. If seductive gold could have stayed the arrows of national decay, the story of liberty's tragic death would not have been embalmed in the ruins of Athens and Greece. In the golden age of Pericles, Athens has been described as being a statue with a "head of gold and feet of clay"—typical of the fact that her segregated aristocracy owned the realm with all of its villas and broad acres, while the common citizens were left to compete with slaves for bread. One surrendered the fruits of toil to physical masters and the other to industrial lords. Aristotle said that "Greek slaves were living machines which a man possesses," and some modern writer has defined an industrial slave as being "one the fruits of whose labor belongs to another." They are the successive footprints on the sands of social dissolution, and brought destruction to Greece in spite of her gold or her brilliant philosophy.

It has been said that the "rise of the Cæsars was the fall of Rome," but it should be remembered that when the patriot Brutus was staining his soul with the blood of the tyrant, three-fourths of the people were being fed from the public granaries and the remainder were debauching in fabulous wealth. According to the record left by the tribune Philipus, only 2,000 men in Rome owned anything. One of these boasted that he had more money than three kings. Another paid $18,000,000 to the Pretorian Guard to wear the Imperial Purple, and seven others purchased the entire Province of Africa. Under this mingled avalanche of pauperism and greed the world's most splendid civilization perished forever.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Does the gentleman think the tariff had anything to do with it?

Mr. BYRD. Not a thing. The price of cotton is one thing that the tariff does not affect, except to contract its market.

How ominously suggestive is the tragedy of this dead nation when viewed in the light of our industrial conditions. Less than a score of men own or control all the railroads and coal fields of half the nation. In 1900 our total wealth was estimated at $90,000,000,000, and Doctor Spahr, in a creditable work on the subject, says that "1 per cent of the families own more of this vast amount than the other 99 per cent, and that one-eighth of the families own seven-eighths of the total amount." Rockefeller, Morgan, and many others could each buy one or more States of the Union, and I dare say would, if offered for sale. But in the shadow of this regal splendor we find lurking the most galling poverty. Many of our crowded industrial centers are the hotbeds of pauperism, vice, and socialism. "In a judicial district in this city there have been more evictions within the last three months than have occurred in the whole of Ireland during the same period," said a New York paper recently. "Hard by the palaces of the nabobs, women and children are being driven to suicide by poverty," says a late writer. Listen to the reading of this about the condition of the poor in New York:

Inspector H. M. Lechstrecker, of the State board of charities, on investigating, reported that out of 10,707 school children only 1,855 or less than one-fifth, began the day's work with adequate breakfast. Over 1,000 children never had for their morning meal more than bread only or coffee only, and nearly 500 came without any breakfast at all. The Salvation Army at once opened food stations for school children, and actually has close to a thousand every morning in attendance.

How does this horrible disclosure impress the minds of the defenders of the beef trust? Let others think as they may, but I had rather die a pauper and slumber in potter's field than to be the prince of a trust withholding food from the starving children of the land. [Applause.]

But one other thought in this connection. The returns of the last election show that socialism is increasing in the United States with alarming rapidity, more so than in any other country. It recently invaded the sacred precincts of a western court and, putting law and justice to flight, acquitted one of the blackest self-confessed criminals of the age. The castles of the millionaires are being guarded by walking battalions, and even the tombs of the dead nabobs are watched by armed sentinels to drive away the socialistic ghouls who seek their dead bodies for ransom.

Mr. Chairman, we can not refrain from pronouncing this system of taxation for private greed as the most stupendous instrument of corruption ever tolerated by any government. Nor was there ever known a more insidious "disguise of disinterested patriotism" than that inspiring the conduct of those who now seek its perpetuation. In unmitigated viciousness it stands without a precedent, without a parallel, and without approval, either by the laws of God or humanity. In my humble judgment protected trusts, in iniquitous comparison with other evils that infest nations, rise like the rugged clifts of a mountain above the surrounding hillocks. Not only do they beget poverty with its attendant vices and crimes, but they paralyze national effort and supplant patriotism by that cringing cowardice common to all people after long submission to public wrong. Foreign invasion, treason, or rebellion are to be preferred. They sweep like "visions of sorrow" across the national horizon, but when their transient race is run, renewed hope and invigorated patriotism urge the people to more exalted triumphs. They may leave in their wake death and hideous ruin, but they do not "killeth the soul" of a nation like these monsters of avaricious greed.

Ill fares the land to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates and men decay;
Princes and lords may flourish or may fade;
A breath can make them, as a breath has made;
But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
When once destroyed can never be supplied.

[Applause.]

Sir, the history of your party is an unending repetition of political crimes. It impoverished a great section by the tyranny of reconstruction; it exploited the Credit Mobilier and star-route frauds; it gave to railroad corporations enough of the public domain to make a State as large as Mississippi; it stole the Chief Magistry of the nation once and has purchased it many times since; but of all its iniquities the blackest and most wicked is the holding up of our 80,000,000 people for the trusts to "rifle" their pockets. Such an act is as cruel and wicked as the tyranny of that ancient despot who rejoiced while burning the homes of his defenseless subjects.

Why longer continue such a policy? The hour for its destruction is at hand. It serves no purpose but usurpation and blesses none but the blessed; the poor it robs of food and the more fortunate of their bounty; it means death to legitimate industry and pauperism to labor; it bars our markets and rots the wealth of the farm. Its scanty virtues have been lost in its prostitution and its vices are supreme on the throne of avarice.

It sits as the arbiter of dishonesty, dividing the earnings of millions with the ghouls of greed. It awards them one-third of the salary of every servant of the Government, from the commanding general in the field to the janitor of this House; it gives the beef trust a full share of the pennies spent by the widow for a soup bone for her starving children; for the trusts it coins into sheckles of gold the sweat and brawn of the toiling farmer, and drives his promising boy from the schoolroom to the plowshare. All classes—the weak, the strong, the Indian, the son of Ham, the Caucasian—are embraced within its insidious folds.

If this policy is to continue, we should erect a monument to departed justice and forever commit to the flames that sacred parchment bearing the insignia of equality of right among men; and we should further publish to the world that this nation is rapidly drifting to the goal of all former republics, and that the last and greatest example of self-government will soon perish—the victim of avarice.

Though why should we despair? Rather should we not rejoice to know that this wrong has reached the climax of its infamy, while the people are yet strong in patriotic virtue. There is a deep, resistless wave of political resentment rolling across the continent, that will not break until enthroned greed is swept from its anchorage into oblivion. The shepherds of the people are patiently keeping the night watch for the star that will guide them to the Bethlehem of a true leader, under whose banner they can march to victory and to liberty. May every Pharisee of greed soon cry out:

The thorns which I have reap'd are of the tree
I planted; they have torn me, and I bleed.
I should have known what fruit would spring from such a seed.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Does not the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] think that we had better rise at this time?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I wish the gentleman from Indiana would let us put in another speaker for about ten minutes and then rise.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, I thought, in view of the insistence of the other side last night to rise at 5 o'clock, that it would be well to do so now.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman from Arkansas desires the floor for an hour.

Mr. MACON. I desire to state to the gentleman from Indiana that the gentleman from Tennessee has agreed to recognize me at this time for one hour, and if the gentleman will allow me to take the floor at this time that I may be recognized to proceed in the morning, I will then yield in order that the committee may now rise.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, I feel that inasmuch as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] began the debate to-day immediately after the reading of the Journal, it would be only fair for this side to have control of that hour to-morrow.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. My intention was to give the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] one hour, let him proceed for a minute or so and then let the committee rise, and have him continue to-morrow morning. I know we are ahead of the gentleman on this side in point of time. If the gentleman desires to use an hour of his time now, I shall not yield to the gentleman from Arkansas until after that hour has been consumed to-morrow.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I suggest that it would be better practice if this side of the Chamber might consume the first hour upon meeting to-morrow.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Very well. Then I shall, with that understanding, yield to the gentleman from Arkansas after that hour has been consumed by the gentleman's side to-morrow.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the post-office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12286. An act granting relief to the estate of James Staley, deceased.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 5215. An act to fix the regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the southern division of the northern district of Alabama, and for other purposes; and

S. 87. An act providing for the withdrawal from public entry of lands needed for town-site purposes in connection with irrigation projects under the reclamation act of June 17, 1902, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 7144. An act for the relief of Aaron Everly;

H. R. 2202. An act granting a pension to Ellen Harriman;

H. R. 3541. An act granting a pension to Dora A. Weathersby;

H. R. 3806. An act granting a pension to Eva L. Martin;

H. R. 4261. An act granting a pension to A. Louisa S. McWhinnie;

H. R. 4593. An act granting a pension to William C. Short;

H. R. 5485. An act granting a pension to Horace D. Mann;

H. R. 5486. An act granting a pension to Margarett Carroll;

H. R. 6147. An act granting a pension to Maud O. Worth;

H. R. 7839. An act granting a pension to Ray E. Kline;

H. R. 8339. An act granting a pension to Vienna Ward;

H. R. 9705. An act granting a pension to George W. Robinson;

H. R. 10785. An act granting a pension to Thomas J. Chambers;

H. R. 11214. An act granting a pension to Isaac Baker;

H. R. 11873. An act granting a pension to Joseph B. Fonner, alias John Havens;

H. R. 12403. An act granting a pension to Lydia A. Fiedler;

H. R. 12656. An act granting a pension to Louise Ackley;

H. R. 13527. An act granting a pension to Willard V. Shepherd;
H. R. 14092. An act granting a pension to Frances Coyner;

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 7, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DOUBLE TAXATION OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I called up the privileged bill (H. R. 16226) to amend the internal-revenue laws and to prevent the double taxation of certain distilled spirits, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That distilled spirits commonly known as "soakage," which exist in the staves or wood of any cask or package at the time of its withdrawal from a distillery or bonded warehouse, shall not be subject to any tax whatever after its withdrawal under or by virtue of the existing laws.

With the following amendment:

In line 7, after the word "laws," add "should such spirits at any time thereafter be recovered from the wood of such package by any process."

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DALZELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

S. 3436. An act to provide for the settlement of a claim of the United States against the State of Michigan for moneys held by said State as trustee for the United States in connection with the St. Marys Falls Ship Canal—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 2350. An act providing for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building at the city of Plattsmouth, Nebr.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 8891. An act granting an increase of pension to Josephine Rogers; and

H. R. 13151. An act granting an increase of pension to Christopher C. Harlan.

BRIDGE ACROSS LITTLE RIVER, ARKANSAS.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 5521) to authorize the Tyronza Central Railroad Company to construct a bridge across Little River, in the State of Arkansas, which I send to the desk, and I ask unanimous consent that a similar House bill upon the Calendar, reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, do lie upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Tyronza Central Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Arkansas, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a drawbridge and approaches thereto across the Little River, in the northeast quarter of section 3, township 11 north, in range 7 east, in Poinsett County, in the State of Arkansas, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman desires the passage of the Senate bill without amendment?

Mr. MACON. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MACON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the similar House bill will lie upon the table. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ROCHAMBEAU STATUE.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following Senate concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a Senate concurrent resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution No. 1.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the concurrent resolution passed February 2, 1904, providing for the publication of the proceedings on the occasion of the unveiling of the Rochambeau statue is hereby continued in force, and excepted from the limitation of one year, as provided in section 80 of the act of January 12, 1895, providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. Reserving the right to object, I desire some information——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, and would like to know the necessity——

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to ask the necessity for this?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say this resolution was passed in the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, but the copy not being submitted to the Public Printer within one year, the authority to print lapsed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is simply to carry out the original legislation.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. That is all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken; and the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING CERTAIN PAPERS AND DOCUMENTS, NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following Senate concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution No. 15.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed the following documents:

First. Reports of the efficiency of various coals used by the United States ships from 1896 to 1898, inclusive, made by the Bureau of Equipment of the Navy in 1899.

Second. Pages 47 to 71, inclusive, of the Report of the Bureau of Equipment of the Navy for 1902, under the heading of "Equipment expenses abroad."

Third. Pages 55 to 67 of the report of said Bureau for 1903, under the same heading.

Fourth. Letter from the Secretary of the Navy to John T. Morgan, with the accompanying statements, dated March 6, 1906.

Said papers to be bound together in cloth as one document, of which the usual number shall be printed and bound for the use of the Senate and 500 copies for the Navy Department.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all of the last paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Said papers to be bound together in cloth as one document, of which 2,000 copies shall be printed—500 copies for the Senate, 1,000 copies for the House of Representatives, and 500 copies for the Navy Department."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether, in the publication of these documents, the expense will be charged to Congressional printing or departmental printing?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. The composition and illustrations, if any, would be charged after July 1 to the Navy Department allotment.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the necessity, then, for allotting to Congress as many volumes of these publications as you have, in view of the fact that they are primarily for the use of the Navy Department?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Well, I will say that the distributing officers of the Senate and House have stated there have been quite a number of requests for publications of this character, growing out of some recent experiments which have been made by the Geological Survey and by the Navy Department. I suggested myself possibly it might be well not to make the distribution in that way, but, on consultation with these officers, it was decided otherwise.

Mr. TAWNEY. One more question, Mr. Speaker. I notice that in the distribution of documents between the two Houses they follow the custom here of distributing documents equally. I do not care anything about this particular document——

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Not equally. The gentleman is in error there. It is about two to one.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not mean equally, but 1,000 to the House and 500 to the Senate, and that is about the same proportion documents are usually distributed, are they not, between the two Houses?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the gentleman who is chairman of the Committee on Printing think that is a fair division of public documents, which are of value to Members of the House and to members of the Senate, in view of the fact that we have 386 Members and the Senate has only 90?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Well, I will say to the gentleman that same question has arisen a number of times, and this is the rule that has been followed. As a matter of fact, the demands on the Senators are greater than the demands on the individual Members of the House, and, in the experience of the superintendents of the folding rooms of the Senate and House, this is as near an equitable and practicable distribution as can be made.

Mr. TAWNEY. I appreciate the fact a Senator represents more people than a Member of the House, but a Member of the House receives requests from as many, if not more, people from his own district than Senators receive from their entire State. I know this matter has been up before, but I think the Committee on Printing ought to consider, in view of the increased membership of the House and increased number of Congressional districts throughout the country, and take seriously under consideration a legitimate apportionment of these public documents which are of value to us. That adjustment was based upon a membership far less than we have at the present time, and when we get a valuable document our quotas are exhausted before we have supplied the demands from our constituents, largely due to the fact we are not getting a fair share of the apportionment.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Oh, I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota, that matter has been seriously taken up here in connection with the other matters which have demanded attention.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then I will say effectually.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. How are the volumes that are alloted to the House placed—to the credit of the individual Member?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. They are.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

MEDICAL AND SANITARY FEATURES OF THE RUSSO-JAPANESE WAR.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate concurrent resolution I send to the Clerk's desk.

Senate concurrent resolution No. 17.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 4,750 copies of the "Report on the Japanese Naval Medical and Sanitary Features of the Russo-Japanese War to the Surgeon-General, United States Navy," by Surg. William C. Braisted, United States Navy, the same to include the illustrations, of which 1,250 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,500 copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for the use of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery of the Navy Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object; but I am going to ask the gentleman to move to amend by striking out all the authorization for the Senate and House of Representatives and leave a thousand copies for the Bureau.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I think the gentleman will make a mistake if he does that. This is considered a very valuable document; the publication of a report made by a special officer detailed by the Navy Department to study sanitary and medical features in connection with the war between Japan and Russia. It is considered one of the most valuable reports that has ever been made, and there will be a great demand made by the surgeons of this country for this publication.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken; and the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to change the reference of the bill H. R. 17297 from the Committee on the Judiciary to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I will state that I do this with the consent of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17297) providing for the establishment of a district court of the United States for China and Korea.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to change that reference from the Committee on the Judiciary to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the further consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16953.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY].

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, the railroad mail pay is a fruitful field for comment by young newspaper and magazine writers for two quite different reasons. One is that so much that is readable can be written about it with so little necessary accurate knowledge of the subject, and the other is that publishers interested in maintaining the pound rate of transportation for their product at 1 cent are always ready to favorably entertain and publish any story caluculated to divert attention from the abuses of the second-class rate to the sums paid to railroads for carrying the mails.

THE AGGREGATE IS LARGE.

The author who speaks in "millions," accompanied by adjectives, always has an audience, and the statement that above $45,000,000 are annually paid to railroads by the Government for mail transportation is usually made with the word "enormous" attached to it, accompanied, perhaps, by the words "robbery" and "fraud."

A short time since there appeared an article in one of the leading newspapers of the United States, displayed in heavy headlines, stating and giving figures to show the correctness of their assertion, that one-tenth of the entire railway earnings were derived from their contract for carrying United States mail. This article was widely copied by American newspapers and has, I think, been inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The fallacy of this statement is easily recognized by reference to the earnings of the American railways, which, as shown by the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, exceeds two thousand millions annually. According, therefore, to this writer, 10 per cent which they receive would amount to $200,000,000. Inasmuch as the total compensation for railway mail pay, including cars, is about $45,000,000, this article merely illustrates the truth of the old proverb that "figures won't lie, but liars will figure."

The cost of our entire post-office establishment is now approaching $200,000,000 a year, and the question naturally arises, For what purpose does the public pay this $200,000,000? The answer is, For having our letters carried from place to place, over our enormous territory, so that business may be transacted, and homes and towns and cities may be maintained in widely scattered regions. Who carries these letters of ours? The railroads. Do we pay the two hundred millions to the railroads? By no means; not much more than one dollar in five is paid to the railroads. Out of every dollar that we expend for the post-office service we pay just 23 cents to the people who carry the mails—that is, to the railroads—and 4 cents to star-route contractors, and the balance we pay chiefly for having the business managed for us and for the modern and very expensive, but apparently necessary luxury of delivering the letter and the newspaper to the citizen at his own door.

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not understand how the gentleman arrives at the percentage of total receipts paid for railway mail pay. I have these figures that were presented, and which showed last year we paid out for railway mail transportation proper and for R. P. O. cars and special facilities, $45,061,689, and the total receipts were $152,836,685.10. I do not see how you can figure that only 23 per cent of the total. I think the true charge of the railway mail pay would amount to a little over 39 per cent of the total receipts. I think that is a very gratifying result myself.

Mr. SIBLEY. I think, Mr. Chairman, that I must have failed to make myself understood. I said that out of each dollar we pay for postal service 23 cents was paid to those who carried the mails on railroads.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is different. I thought you meant that of every dollar we received as postal revenue. Of course we may be extravagant in other directions, but that would not be a proper criterion.

Mr. SIBLEY. The service of the post-office is carrying the mails. The Department, to whom we pay close upon $200,000,000 for the service, pays about one-fourth of it to those who actually do the carrying.

The salaries of postmasters and their clerks amount to forty-four millions; city free delivery costs twenty-one millions; rural free delivery, twenty-eight millions; officials at Washington and elsewhere aggregate other millions. These items constitute largely the expense of the machine that we have created.

We must have post-offices in which to sort and distribute the mails, so that each letter shall reach the very person for whom intended and no other, and yet 85 per cent of the work of sorting and distributing the mails is performed in the post-office cars, or traveling post-offices, furnished by the railroads. And the marvel of it is that this real distribution of the mails is carried on while the mails are flying through space, so that the speed of transmitting a letter from sender to receiver is tremendously accelerated.

Experts say that if all railway car post-offices were now abolished the average time for transmission of mails in this country would be more than doubled. How do we pay for this tremendous special enlargement of our mail facilities? We make an allowance to such railroad companies as furnish and haul over their roads full-length, specially built postal cars the low haulage or wheelage rate of about 5 cents per mile for each mile the car is hauled, or, as a witness before the Wolcott commission puts it, "a lower rate than the railroads charge each other for hauling in a freight train an empty box car being taken home for repairs." This item is what the young newspaper writer denominates "rent of postal cars."

I say, therefore, that when the facts are considered it is a great mistake to think that because the appropriation required to compensate the railroads for performing the mail transport service of the country is large it is necessarily too large. In comparison with other features it is small.

Gentlemen speak of the enormous increase in payments to the railways and complain because this year we have made larger appropriations than for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906. It is true that year by year the cost of the transportation of railway mail has increased. If gentlemen will turn to page 13 in the report on the post-office appropriation bill they will find at the top of the page the appropriations for the year 1900 and for each subsequent year, which show that the appropriations have increased from $33,275,000 in 1900 to $40,900,000 for the fiscal year 1906. This shows a total increase of 22.9 per cent, covering a period of six years, or an average annual rate of increase of 3.8 per cent.

If gentlemen will turn to page 23 of the same report, at the bottom of the page, and commence with the year 1900, they will find that down to the close of the fiscal year 1906 the total expenditures of the Post-Office Department during that period have increased by an aggregate of 52 per cent, or an average increase of 8.67 per cent. If the railway mail pay had increased in the same ratio that the general expenses of the Post-Office Department have increased, instead of appropriating $40,900,000 we would have appropriated $50,577,000.

If you will look on the top of page 12 of the same report, you will find that for regulation, screen, and other wagon service the increase in this compensation for the same six years has been 47 per cent, or an annual increase of 7.9 per cent. If the same rate of increase had applied to railway mail service that has applied to wagon service, instead of appropriating for the fiscal year 1906 $40,900,000, we would have appropriated $48,814,000.

If you will turn to the middle of page 13, for the compensation to administrative officers and postal clerks, you will find that the increase for six years has been at the average rate of 9½ per cent, as against an increase in railway mail compensation of but 3.8 per cent. Had the railway mail pay increased in the same ratio that the compensation to administrative officers and postal clerks has increased, we would have appropriated for the fiscal year 1906 $52,241,000 instead of $40,900,000.

If you will turn to page 16, there will be afforded a significant item. The Government a few years since commenced to make its own postage stamps. The result has been that during the six years ending with the fiscal year 1906 the cost of manufacturing postage stamps has increased a trifle more than 100 per cent, while the cost of railway mail pay compensation has increased but 22.9 per cent.

Had the railway mail pay compensation increased at the same ratio as the increase in the cost of Government-manufactured postage stamps, we would have appropriated for the fiscal year 1906, $66,550,000, or an increase of $26,550,000 more than we actually appropriated.

In the item for the railway post-office car service the appropriation is $5,875,000, an average increase for the last six years of 6.6 per cent per annum.

Had this item, which you designate as rent of postal cars, increased in the same ratio as the general expenses have increased, we would have appropriated this year $6,396,160.

I will not weary your patience with the further details of dry statistics, but I can assure any gentleman that precisely in proportion as he will acquaint himself with the facts and analyze the figures he will be forced to the same conclusion as was reached by that distinguished committee who for more than two years investigated the problem of whether the Government was granting undue compensation.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman has evidently studied the question pretty carefully, I desire to ask him a question for information. A few years ago—within the last five or six years, I do not remember on which one of the appropriation bills it was, but we changed to a new system of letting star-route contracts, providing they should be let to people along the line of route. Now, has that had any effect in increasing the cost of the star-route service? Can the gentleman answer?

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think that that question can be answered much better by the gentleman from Indiana. I will merely state that we did find that for the compensation on star routes the appropriation has increased, notwithstanding the fact that we have substituted free delivery for many of the star routes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit, I will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that while the total amount for star-route service has not greatly increased by reason of the gradual extension of rural free-delivery service in the same section of the country, nevertheless the contracts for the star-route service, to a very small amount, has increased on account of the limitation to which the gentleman from Kentucky refers, because the price to the local resident along the line of the route is greater than where the contracts were sublet from a general central contractor. In addition to that, a further limitation has been provided, which authorizes the collection and delivery of individual mail along the routes, which, in turn, increases the cost of that service, although we are getting better service at the higher rate for star-route service. The reduction is due entirely to the gradual extension of the rural delivery service. I will state that since 1882—I think that is the date—the total expense for star-route service has only increased between one and two millions of dollars, showing that it has not increased in the same proportion as the other service. You can not compare it by reason of the additional service on these lines from the extension of rural service.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SIBLEY. I will yield to my friend.

Mr. NORRIS. Before the gentleman leaves that subject I wish he would give us the result of his research on the difference in the cost, on a per cent basis, if he can, of postage stamps when they were made under contract by private parties and since the Government has been making them itself.

Mr. SIBLEY. I think I have not the data that would qualify me to give exact figures during the hour that I have at my disposal this morning, but I think under the five-minute rule I will be able to give the gentleman the figures.

IMPORTANCE OF THE SERVICE.

This railroad service is a vital feature. It is in reality the mail system of the nation. Rural free delivery is a modern luxury. Ten years ago it was unknown, and for experimental service in that direction we appropriated $40,000. There existed for this service of rural free delivery no universal demand. We are now appropriating for this service for the coming year $28,000,000, and we are not blind to the fact that before many years the expenditure for this item alone promises to largely exceed the amount paid for the railroad mail transportation of the nation. No Member is heard protesting against rural free delivery, but many seem ready to believe all manner of idle newspaper and magazine gossip, truthful or otherwise, in order to find some excuse for curtailing the necessary and important service performed by the railroads.

The pound-rate service, the carriage of second-class matter at 1 cent per pound for the benefit of newspapers and magazine publishers, is a luxury, and a very expensive one. Let me read from the report of the Postmaster-General to show what this costs:

According to estimates heretofore made and published, matter of the second class approximates in weight two-thirds of the bulk of all mail matter, yet produces only about 4 per cent of the postage revenue.

The cost to the Government of hauling all mail matter is estimated to be between 5 and 8 cents a pound. A portion of second-class matter mailed by publishers and news agents is carried free of all postage, and from the remainder the revenue is 1 cent a pound upon the bulk weight, paid in money, regardless of the number of pieces in the pound, except that copies addressed for carrier delivery in the city of publication are required to be prepaid by postage stamps affixed at the rate of 1 cent a copy on newspapers, regardless of weight; 1 cent a copy on periodicals not in excess of 2 ounces in weight, and 2 cents a copy if over 2 ounces. Publishers usually employ private carriers for delivering in the city of publication. The revenue derived from such copies when mailed is estimated to be but twenty-four one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the postage revenue, and is not taken into account in these calculations.

During the last fiscal year the total weight carried at 1 cent a pound and free was 663,107,128 pounds. If it cost the Government as much as 5 cents a pound to handle this matter in the mails, it will be seen that the amount paid out was $33,155,356.40. The actual revenue was $6,186,647.54.

Mr. REEDER. At a loss of $28,000,000.

Mr. SIBLEY. At a loss of more than $27,000,000.

The situation now and for some time past with regard to the publishers of bona fide newspapers and periodicals, and to the public itself, is wholly different from that at the time the law was enacted. Whether it is sound public policy to continue the present rates and conditions for this class of matter, so liable to abuses, is a subject well worthy of the most serious consideration. No person who has given it even casual thought but admits the desirability, even the necessity, of a change. Any change, however, is certain to be resisted by those whose interests are benefited by the present conditions.

Has any Member of this House who has attacked the railroad mail pay offered one practical suggestion for reducing the expense of this wholly unnecessary luxury of transporting the magazine and newspaper freight of this country for the benefit of great publishing corporations at an expense to the Government of $27,000,000 a year? If so, I have not heard him.

Mr. HARDWICK rose.

Mr. SIBLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to ask the gentleman this question for information: Is the gentleman aware of the fact whether, in the report of the Postmaster-General, submitted to this Congress at the opening of this session, the Postmaster-General says himself that the Congress and his Department have not sufficient data to find out whether we are paying too much for carrying the railway mail generally or not?

Mr. SIBLEY. Further along I will, in the course of my remarks, give the gentleman the best answer I can. Here, then, exists to-day in our post-office system class-mail abuse, costing this tremendous sum of money. Whose voices in this House are seriously raised to reform this expensive feature of the post-office service?

So far from any measure of reform being proposed in these matters where reform might amount to something, we are constantly, and this very year, extending the cost of rural free delivery and increasing by millions the expense of handling the second-class matter.

The cost of these two items in the mail service exceeds already by $10,000,000 the entire amount paid to railroads for transporting the mails by rail into every part of the country, and amounts to about four times this year's so-called "deficit" of fifteen millions in that Department. There is, in truth, no "deficit." According to the report of the Postmaster-General, we paid last year to newspaper and magazine publishers a bonus of $27,000,000, in order to swell the profits of their already lucrative business undertakings. The great increase in the number of new magazines, loaded with advertisements, shows how profitable this field of business has become. If these periodicals paid to the Government of the United States two-thirds of the sum which it costs the Government to convey them, there would exist to-day a surplus in the postal revenues rather than a deficit. Your committee have taken measures which will at the next session afford opportunity to judge more accurately where the real leakage exists. We believe that the American citizen is entitled to be made acquainted at the earliest moment with the current happenings, and we have sought to facilitate in every proper way the rapid transmission of intelligence to the people, and if this service should be performed at a close margin, or trifling loss, the public good to be attained would be full compensation for any pecuniary deficit. But magazines, so-called, which, through a great circulation of inflammatory and revolutionary matter, and which in some instances are shown to be simply blackmail publications, reaching, as they do, millions of people, make their advertising columns sources of tremendous revenues to those publishers; and the fair question is, How many millions of dollars shall Congress appropriate as a direct bonus to these publications? If this bonus were withdrawn, if it were only even cut in two, the operations of the post-office would this year almost show a profit, notwithstanding the expenditure of twenty-one millions for rural free delivery.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me an interruption there?

Mr. SIBLEY. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. In your computation you will allow this, of course, that second-class matter, by reason of its wide distribution, creates first-class matter which pays us for the service almost wholly.

Mr. SIBLEY. Oh, unquestionably, there is an interdependence; and for the benefit of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I wish to state, and perhaps the chairman of our committee, in his introductory remarks stated, that we are going to attempt to have the different classes of mail matter weighed so that we can know exactly the items which are responsible for this large deficit in our postal receipts and which increase our postal expenses, and we intend to have this information ready to report to the next session of this Congress.

Mr. SCOTT. In regard to the provision which you are making for having this second-class matter weighed during the coming two months, have you provided in any way for distinction in the second-class matter, separating newspapers from magazines and other advertising publications?

Mr. SIBLEY. Yes; whether they be fraternal magazines or any of the various types of second-class matter, the different forms of second-class matter which are deposited in the post-office will be weighed, so that the House may have for its own information and guidance the most complete exhibit that it is possible for us to have as afforded by the post-office.

Mr. PRINCE. I think the question which I desired to ask has been asked in part by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] and by the other gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT]; but this is the question I was going to ask you: As a matter of fact, does not the cheap mail service accorded to papers and magazines stimulate and increase the postal receipts by increasing business of other kinds?

Mr. SIBLEY. I should think, Mr. Chairman, that it would be a very fair answer to say unquestionably to some extent, but how far it would reach to overcome this deficit might be a question of doubt.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Does the gentleman think that the magazines get up enough correspondence to equal the $27,000,000 deficit that the gentleman complains of, or the amount that the magazines cost to transport over and above the revenue they pay the Government?

Mr. SIBLEY. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I do not think the magazines alone create a deficit of $27,000,000 of which the Postmaster-General complains.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I mean mail of that class.

Mr. SIBLEY. To know what class of matter it is that loads down the mails with this tremendous weight is the object sought by the committee in asking that this weighing take place in every post-office in the United States.

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SIBLEY. I will, but I am afraid my time is being rapidly exhausted.

Mr. PRINCE. I do not think the gentleman from West Virginia understood my question. I said papers and magazines. I trust the gentleman from West Virginia is not opposed to the country newspapers getting this privilege.

Mr. SIBLEY. Oh, no.

Mr. MURDOCK. In that connection I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that the daily newspaper circulates in a circumscribed zone, and covers only one or two routes, while the magazines will go across the country and cover a great many contract routes.

Mr. SIBLEY. Yes; we found in our hearings some years ago that many of these magazines were sent out by freight when going short distances. In other instances they were sent by express, but when they were to be sent across the continent or to any long distance—when there was a long journey ahead and it was going to cost large amounts of money to send them—the United States Government carried them in the mails, and the post-office did not get the business except for long distances.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania one other question at that point. If the Government is carrying this printed matter at less than a reasonable rate, are not the people getting the benefit of that, and if you undertake to increase that rate do you not increase the price necessarily that the people will have to pay for the literature?

Mr. SIBLEY. That would be a subject for discussion perhaps out in the cloakroom between my friend from Kentucky and myself, whether the people are benefited by having the great flood of misinformation distributed over the country. It is a question whether this information for the public mind affords the people a just basis—whether the apprehension and the prejudice created and calumny that he reads in many of these periodicals at the present time can be called beneficial literature.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. If you attempt to draw the line between that which carries correct information and that which does not, what kind of a tribunal will you establish for adjudicating that question?

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I said at the outset that I did not think this was a question to be discussed here, that we might philosophically discuss it in the cloakroom. The thought of the committee, and I believe of all men, is that we should give to our newspapers, which afford the American citizenship speedy and prompt knowledge of the current events and the events transpiring throughout the world, all the facilities that we can; the public is entitled to receive that information, and we can accelerate that service and perhaps need not figure closely as to whether we are carrying it at a profit or a loss. But for the benefit of some one running a private enterprise that does not apply. If you will turn to the modern magazine and see the hundreds of advertisements you will admit that to run that private enterprise at the expense of the United States Government is an unfair and an unjust proposition, and that they should not be granted that right.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I would like to ask him if it ever occurred to him to inquire as to the extent of the business originated by these advertisements—the millions and millions of dollars that these advertisers originate?

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have not done that and I am afraid that my time is going to be occupied without my saying anything about railway mail pay. [Laughter.] I saw a man not long ago, in an office I was in, pull out and open a package to see what he had got in answer to one of these advertisements. He sent $2 and he got a value of about 25 cents.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I would not venture to say what the nature of his advertisement was, but I say that it occurs to me that when he is figuring a profit and loss he ought to take into consideration the fact that the advertisements in these magazines originate millions and millions of dollars in the way of business for manufacturing companies, express companies, and railroad companies of the United States.

Mr. SIBLEY. Has it ever occurred to the gentleman to investigate the probable millions of dollars that we have given to the owners of these magazines because of the Government being willing to transport them at a loss?

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIBLEY. I yield for a question, but I can not enter into an argument on magazine ethics.

Mr. YOUNG. I wish merely to suggest to the gentleman that if this business originated with these advertisements were so profitable to the magazines that the owners of those magazines might well afford to pay the actual cost for their transportation.

Mr. SIBLEY. I thank my friend for the suggestion. We do not even desire the actual cost, but we do believe the time has come when the cost ought to be fairly divided, and that Uncle Sam is occasionally entitled to the turkey end of the proposition, and we think these publications ought to pay at least two-fifths of the cost of the service that we perform for them.

Another charge brought against the present rate of railroad compensation is that it is greatly in excess of sums paid by the express companies to the railroads for similar service. This charge is so frequently made and has been so seldom denied that the truthfulness of the statement has come to be a matter of public belief, yet the sworn testimony taken before the Wolcott Commission shows the contrary to be the case.

On page 520, Part I, appears the testimony of Henry S. Julier, general manager of the American Express Company, who, after stating that he had no interest in any railway company, testified:

> Upon the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad for the year ending June 30, 1897 (the latest year then available for comparison), the cost per ton per mile paid by the American Express Company to the railroad was 7.01 cents, while the Government paid to the same railroad over the same lines for mail carriage in the same period 6.45 cents per ton per mile.

The Boston and Albany Railroad, in the same period, received for mails 6.35 cents per ton per mile. For express it received 7.53 cents per ton per mile, or 18 per cent greater compensation, pound for pound, from the carriage of express than from the mails.

On page 549, Part II, appears the testimony of the auditor of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad:

> The Burlington carried last year 8,489,000 tons of express one mile for the Adams Express Company and 14,243,000 tons of mail for the Government, and ton for ton, pound for pound, it received from the express company more money than it did from the Government.

On page 682, Part I, of the same report Mr. Samuel Spencer, president of the Southern Railway, testified:

> The actual rate received by the Southern Railway for the mail tonnage handled in 1898 was 5.6 cents per pound.
> The average amount received by the Southern Railway per ton per mile for hauling express is 6⅓ cents, or 17 per cent greater than the sum received for hauling the mail.

On page 647, Part I, Wolcott Commission's Report, Mr. T. Postlethwaite, of the Pennsylvania Railroad, testified that his company receives for the carriage of mail between New York and Philadelphia 27 cents per hundred and for express 87 cents per hundred, and that taking the average weight of express and mail, a car between New York and Philadelphia in express service would earn on one trip $87.84, while the average of the postal car would be $22.51.

Testimony to the same effect was given by the Northern Pacific and many other railroads, and no testimony was given in contradiction to these statements.

What I have said is, of course, not an answer to the question whether the Government is paying too much to railroad companies for the transportation of the mails. Some persons answer that question promptly in the affirmative who do not know how much we are paying. Others make the ignorant reply that the rate must be excessive because the law remains as it stood in 1878.

Hon. William H. Moody, now Attorney-General, was for several years a Member of the House, and an active and influential member of the Wolcott Commission. He has stated that he entered upon that investigation impressed with the conviction that the rates paid to the railroads for carrying the mails were excessive, but that the evidence changed his mind, and that it was his conviction that no service was rendered to the Government on fairer terms of compensation than that of the railway mail service. He unites with Senators Wolcott, ALLISON, and MARTIN and Representatives Loud and Catchings in the chief conclusion of the Commission, which was against any reduction whatever in the rate of railway compensation so long as the railroads are required to perform the services by the present very expensive methods. Mr. Moody preferred to state his conclusions in a separate report, in the course of which he said:

> The existing law prescribing mail pay automatically lowers the rate on any given route as the volume of traffic increases. By the normal effect of this law the rate per ton per mile is $1.17 when the average daily weight of mail is 200 pounds, and, decreasing with the increase of volume, it becomes 6.073 cents when the average daily weight is 300,000 pounds. Under the operations of this law the average rate per ton per mile has decreased from 26.42 cents in 1873 to 12.567 cents in 1898. Beginning with 1880 (the first year in which all the statistics are available for comparison) passenger rates have decreased 21 per cent; freight rates, 44 per cent, and mail rates, 39 per cent.

Now, unless some one can answer that argument of Mr. Moody's, there is nothing in the contention that the rate must be excessive because the law has stood for many years.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if his fellow-members upon that Commission agreed with Mr. Moody in his conclusion?

Mr. SIBLEY. All agreed except two. There were two minority reports filed. I think Mr. Fleming, of Georgia, filed a minority report, and Professor Adams did not join.

Mr. LLOYD. But Professor Adams was not a member of the Commission.

Mr. SIBLEY. No; he was an expert. I should have said Mr. Chandler.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Of course this is all information to me. I had the impression that the gentleman said nearly everyone else had about the comparison of express rates and mail rates on the railroads. I see that the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. STEENERSON, in his remarks quotes the figures of Professor Adams made in that report, and he gives an illustration here of the New York Central Railroad, between New York and Buffalo, a distance of 439 miles, in which he says that the charge per ton per mile is $31.73, while the charge per ton per mile for express is only $12.15. There seems to be a very wide difference between Mr. Moody and Professor Adams. It looks to me as if there ought to be some way to get at the truth of this matter, and I do not know of any person any better qualified to examine into and dig up the truth from it than the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY]. I think he has investigated the matter pretty fully, and I would like to hear him give his opinion upon the merits of these respective figures.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, the fact of it is that Professor Adams, I think, to-day admits that he made an error. If you will examine Mr. Julier's testimony, at page 516, Part II, of the Wolcott Commission, you will find that he points out that Professor Adams was mistaken. He stated that Professor Adams gives the amount received by the New York Central for the carriage of 100 pounds of express from New York to Chicago as $1.25, while the actual payment by the express company was $2.59. Professor Adams was 50 per cent out of the way. From New York to Indianapolis Professor Adams gave the rate of $1.13, but in fact they paid the railroad company $2.57. Professor Adams gives the rate per hundred from Chicago to Minneapolis as $1, and the express company actually paid to the railroad, according to Mr. Julier's testimony, $2. Now, there is the sworn testimony of the general manager, which I think perhaps would answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. In view of that statement, I want to suggest that it looks to me as if it would be a very good rule to observe in the discussion of these questions in this body not to throw into our remarks a lot of unreliable information. If Professor Adams's figures were clearly wrong, as this last statement of the gentleman indicates, they ought not to go into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to be spread broadcast throughout the country.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I thoroughly agree with my friend from Kentucky, and I think we all seek to give the House, or ought to at least, such information as we possess, and certainly when the question is not a partisan one, but one reaching into our entire domestic economy, this should be done. But I suggest this, that even statisticians will differ. Why, sometimes on tariff schedules you can not get two men to look at the same figures alike to save your life.

Men are prone to error. A man states a proposition, and states it from his own belief, candidly and honestly, but he has been misled into an error, and so General Manager Julier, in commenting upon the statement of Professor Adams, showed that the actual figures of Professor Adams, who is ordinarily a very accurate gentleman, in that instance were errors.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him this question? In 1873, when the original statute under which we are now operating——

Mr. SIBLEY. We do not operate under that now.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, there are two amendments, and the last one was in 1878, and now the statute under which it operates, as finally amended in 1878, fixes the 5,000 pounds as a limit of the large scale.

Mr. SIBLEY. I am going to come to that now, if my friend will wait.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman mind answering this question? Do you not think the changed conditions—the growth of the mail service—require a still further reduction above the 5,000 pounds limit?

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, in response to my friend from Georgia, I will state that I believe that any man seeking alone the truth and divesting himself of bias, if he will investigate the railway mail compensation, will come to the same conclusion that was arrived at by that Commission, which put nearly three years of hard, earnest, honest work upon the subject.

Mr. HARDWICK. And that is exactly the conclusion the expert—the man who went abroad—came to. Is not that it?

Mr. SIBLEY. I can not undertake, Mr. Chairman, to tell what another man thinks.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. SIBLEY. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is it not a fact that Mr. Moody, who made the separate report, stated that upon the evidence he was in doubt as to the size of the average load carried in postal cars; that if the Department officials were correct, that the average load was 3½ tons, then it was clear that the railway mail pay upon dense routes should be reduced; and did not Professor Adams figure out that if the average load was 3½ tons, then the railway mail pay upon the New York Central, where is carried as heavy traffic as 300,000 pounds—150 tons—is paying them twice as much as it cost. In other words, in round numbers it cost $150 to render the service of the railroads for which they receive over $300. Are these figures disputed by anybody?

Mr. SIBLEY. Why, Mr. Chairman, I know that my friend, from long experience on the committee with me, states all his propositions accurately, or intends to; but he starts his proposition with: "And if," "if so," and "if so and so." The best judgment that I can form, and that I believe the majority form, is that the load is not as great, but it is about 2 tons to the car.

Mr. STEENERSON. Very well; if the gentleman will yield further. Will the gentleman concede that the whole question of railway mail pay turns upon the size of the load? Is not that an ascertainable fact, and further investigation could satisfy the gentleman that it is not 2 tons, but is nearer 5 tons——

Mr. SIBLEY. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the whole question does not turn on the weight. It turns on the speed as well as the weight, and the cost of the service to be performed, the conditions surrounding it, the requirements made by the Department; there are many conditions besides that of weight.

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman if it is not agreeable to him.

Mr. SIBLEY. I like to yield to the gentleman if I am able to give him any information.

Mr. STEENERSON. On the principle of the law of 1873, as it stands unchanged except a horizontal reduction of 5 per cent and 10 per cent, is it not a fact we allow for speed because that law gives pay for the piece on the amount of work? If the railway train travels 500 miles in a day and you allow them per mile per ton, you pay them for the speed, because it does it in less time. If the railway car travels in twenty-four hours a thousand miles, they need less railway equipment than if they traveled 25 miles an hour. Is not the whole principle of the law of 1873 that railway post-office pay is based upon piece pay, upon the pay of so much for the work?

The CHAIRMAN. The time assigned to the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to trespass on the patience of the House, and I think I can hurry through in a few more minutes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield fifteen minutes further to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for fifteen minutes further.

Mr. SIBLEY. I would say to my friend from Minnesota in closing that I do not know of anybody who has acquired information any faster than he has on postal affairs. I am perfectly willing to believe that in three or four years' further service he will occupy somewhat the position on this subject that I occupy at the present time. [Laughter.] I can see that he is appreciating the fact that the mail rates on the smaller lines are not excessive to-day, and with that further investigation and the power of close analysis and the logical mind he has I am sure he will arrive at the full truth of it later on.

Mr. STEENERSON. I would ask the gentleman if we ought not to recognize that this question is governed by the amount of traffic and the weight of the load?

Mr. SIBLEY. I will publish in my remarks the rate for the various classes and weights, together with the rate paid for the different kinds.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will say to the gentleman that, although he has no doubt spent a great deal of time in the study of this subject——

Mr. SIBLEY. Not a great deal.

Mr. STEENERSON (continuing). That I have spent as much time in the last three sessions that I have served on that committee as the gentleman.

Mr. SIBLEY. No doubt. I will here insert the table to which I have referred.

Schedule of rates for railway mail transportation.

Average weight of mails per day carried over whole length of route.	Pay per mile per annum. Rates allowable under act of Mar. 3, 1873.	Rates allowable under acts of July 12, 1876, and June 17, 1878.	Rates allowable to land-grant railroads, being 80 per cent of allowance to other railroads, under act of July 12, 1876.	Intermediate weight warranting allowance of $1 per mile under the custom of the Department, subject to acts of July 12, 1876, and June 17, 1878.
				Pounds.
200 pounds	$50.00	$42.75	$34.20
200 pounds to 500 pounds				12
500 pounds	75.00	64.12	51.30
500 pounds to 1,000 pounds				20
1,000 pounds	100.00	85.50	68.40
1,000 pounds to 1,500 pounds				20
1,500 pounds	125.00	106.87	85.50
1,500 pounds to 2,000 pounds				20
2,000 pounds	150.00	128.25	102.60
2,000 pounds to 3,500 pounds				60
3,500 pounds	175.00	149.62	119.70
3,500 pounds to 5,000 pounds				60
5,000 pounds	200.00	171.00	136.80
For every additional 2,000 pounds	25.00	21.37	17.10
Over 5,000 pounds				80

No allowance is made for weights not justifying the addition of $1.

Rates allowable per mile per annum for use of R. P. O. cars when authorized.

Railway post-office cars, 40 feet, per daily line	$25
Railway post-office cars, 45 feet, per daily line	30
Railway post-office cars, 50 feet, per daily line	40
Railway post-office cars, 55–60 feet, per daily line	50

To constitute a "line" of railway post-office cars between given points sufficient R. P. O. cars must be provided and run to make a trip daily each way between those points.

WHAT DO WE PAY?

The present method of payment is by weight. Upon every mail route carrying 5,000 pounds of mail and upward daily the compensation for the excess above 5,000 pounds is limited under the present law and can not amount to 1 cent per pound. It is, therefore, an entirely accurate statement to make that the railroad pay for a large part of the mail they carry is less than 1 cent per pound. Anyone may figure that out for himself very easily. The rate upon these heavy routes now fixed by law is 5.85 cents per ton per mile for all mail beyond 5,000 pounds. The average length of haul of each pound of mail does not, in my opinion, at the present time exceed 340 miles. Multiply 340 by 5.85 cents; the rate per ton is, therefore, $19.89, and as there are twenty hundred in a ton, the rate per pound is less than a cent.

Is 1 cent per pound too high a rate for the bulk of the mail—that is, for carrying a pound of mail 340 miles—each pound divided up, if composed of letters, into forty-five parts, and packages of which are taken on and off at nearly every station during the course of every day?

What Member of this House regards himself possessed of sufficient knowledge and information on the subject to intelligently answer that question?

REPORT OF THE WOLCOTT COMMISSION.

I candidly admit that my own opinions upon this question have been much influenced by the report of the Wolcott Commission. That committee was composed of eight members of the Senate and House. Six of these members—Senators WOLCOTT, ALLISON, and MARTIN, and Representatives LOUD, MOODY, and CATCHINGS—united in the conclusion that the present rate of compensation of railroads for carrying the mails is no higher than it ought to be, and is being constantly and sufficiently reduced by the increase of the mails on the heavy routes, to which increase the minimum rate of about 1 cent per pound applies.

I have confidence in the integrity of those Senators and Representatives, and in their judgment. Their conclusion on the main point has the approval of the Post-Office Department, and is, I think, in accord with the views of the Post-Office Committee of this House. What facts are found before us to justify any Member in voting to overthrow the judgment of the Wolcott Commission? What is the use of having an investigation of a complex subject like this, extending over two years, and a decision by the ablest and most trusted Members of Congress, if we are to set it aside upon mere hearsay and newspaper and magazine gossip?

Mr. STEENERSON. I would ask the gentleman if he does not think that the information we receive as to the size of the average load from the Post-Office Department is just as good information of that to which it relates as the opinion of these members of the Wolcott Commission upon the testimony before them? They were not experts; they knew nothing about it. Is it not quite as well to read the evidence and pass upon it? The Department said the load was different from what the railroad men said, and Mr. Shallenberger says that it is from five to eight thousand pounds to-day, and it must be larger, because they use more storage cars.

Mr. SIBLEY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I agree that there has been, and probably will be, a continued increase. That does not determine yet whether the railways are receiving an excessively large sum for the service performed.

ONE RESULT NOT ALWAYS THOUGHT OF.

The first suggestion in this country of assorting and making distribution of letters and papers on the cars was made in 1862 by Mr. W. A. Davis, a clerk in the post-office at St. Joseph, Mo., whose idea was that it would greatly facilitate the starting of the overland mail west from St. Joseph.

The real organizer, however, of the present railway fast mail system was Col. George S. Bangs, of Illinois, who became superintendent in 1871. He secured between New York and Chicago, over the New York Central and Lake Shore roads, in 1875, the first exclusive mail train, followed by the Pennsylvania.

In the year 1888 the publishing house of Charles Scribner's Sons brought out a rather celebrated book entitled "The American Railway," which contained an article by Hon. Thomas L. James, who was at one time postmaster of New York, and subsequently Postmaster-General under Garfield, with the title "The Railway Mail Service." This article is historical and not in any sense written in the railroad interest nor by a railroad man.

Referring to the establishment of the fast mail service, Mr. James says:

Thus had been established two fast trains, and the outlook was bright for the future, when Congress, in spite of the efforts of the Post-Office Department, passed an act reducing the already inadequate compensation to the trunk lines for the carrying of the mails. This action brought official notice from Messrs. Vanderbilt and Scott of the discontinuance of the fast mail trains between New York City and Chicago, and that service ended.

Colonel Bangs was greatly mortified at this result, but stood his ground and remained at his post until the close of the year. Then, worn out with never-ending toil and disheartened by the action of Congress, he tendered his resignation and insisted on its acceptance. Parted from the post-office, President Grant, knowing his worth and wishing to recognize his services, appointed him assistant treasurer of the United States at Chicago. He lived to perform the duties of this office only a few months, as death overtook him suddenly while on a visit to Washington on official business, December, 1876. His work, however, was not permitted to drop. He had left in the service three assistants—Theodore N. Vail, William B. Thompson (afterwards Second Assistant Postmaster-General), and John Jameson—who were fully imbued with the ideas of their late chief and were fully loyal to them. They, in the order named, became his successors, and never permitted opportunities to escape wherein there was a possible benefit to the service to be secured. Although the fast mail service was suspended for lack of support from Congress, its usefulness and practicability had been so thoroughly demonstrated that an appropriation of $150,000 was made in March, 1877, for its resumption on the trunk lines. This victory was not reached without untiring efforts on the part of Mr. Vail and by generous support in both Houses of Congress—in the Senate by the Hon. Hannibal Hamlin and James G. Blaine, of Maine, and in the House of Representatives by such broad and liberal statesmen as Mr. Waddell, of North Carolina; Mr. Randall, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Cox, of New York.

There is a point in this recital which may be worthy of very serious consideration at the present time.

Mr. James says:

The outlook was bright for the future, when Congress, in spite of the efforts of the Post-Office Department, passed an act reducing the already inadequate compensation to the trunk lines for the carrying of the mails. This action brought official notice from Messrs. Vanderbilt and Scott of the discontinuance of the fast mail trains between New York City and Chicago, and that service ended.

History may in this respect repeat itself. This House, in spite of the opinions and advice of the Post-Office Department, in spite of the almost unanimous report of the Wolcott investigating committee, in spite of the report of its own Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, in spite of all the facts and reason of the case, may, without investigation, reduce this rate of its own sweet, autocratic will.

There is good reason for thinking that this may result in a discontinuance of the fast mail service. The Pennsylvania company now runs eight special fast mail trains, and the New York Central system runs as many. Suppose that service is ended, as may very easily result from ill-considered action on our part?

The people managing our American railways, to my mind, are honorable gentlemen, the peers of any men in all the breadth of our continent. They have by their energy and genius been potential agents in our national development. They are seeking within their sphere to do their duty to the stockholders, their constituents, and to their country, perhaps as honorably and consistently as we are seeking to do ours; but the continued iterations and reiterations that they are seeking to wrongfully wrest from the pockets of the public tremendous sums of money beyond all just deserts becomes after a time galling. So long as this shall be confined to irresponsible writers in newspapers and periodicals, and is not shared by the general public or indorsed by Congress, whose duty it is to investigate and determine, they accept these criticisms as we all do, appealing from the unjust aspersion to the court of public judgment. But when that public judgment shall approve the assertions of irresponsible writers, there is but one course left open, and the action that I fear may be taken, namely, the withdrawing the special facilities and transporting mail as they transport other matter, not at the highest possible attainable schedules, but at reasonable and remunerative speed schedules, for it is well known that a steamer of given dimensions may be driven 18 knots an hour on a consumption of 200 tons of coal daily, but to maintain a speed of 20 knots an hour would require something like 450 tons of coal daily. And it does not require a high degree of knowledge of railway technique to know that the speed of 50 miles an hour is maintained at a cost, approximately, double that of 35 miles an hour.

We live in an age which demands the best of all things—the highest degree of comfort, the best of homes, and the best of food. We aim for the best in our political, economic, social, and moral life, and our American railway system, and our railway mail system, both of which are the wonder and admiration of all the other nations of the world, are also the pride of the fair-minded people of this country, and I can not believe that either in this House or elsewhere there exists any considerable number of people who earnestly desire any service rendered them for which an adequate compensation should not be given. [Loud applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman from Tennessee occupy some of his time now?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Very well. I yield an hour to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON].

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, it makes little difference to me whether the antireform Members of the House desire to hear me or not, so long as the Reporter will give me his ear, for, sir, I do not expect to be able to convert a single one of those Members who have been able to stay here year in and year out by reason of the support and influence given them by the great corporations of this country, it being my purpose at this time to call the attention of the country to some of the iniquities of the Post-Office appropriation bill that is now being considered by the House.

And in the outset I desire to call attention to the fact that the bill passed by the House a year ago making appropriation for the support of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year will be in full force and effect until the 30th day of June, and hence if it is the desire of Congress to eliminate the many evils that are being upheld in this bill, to defeat the measure at this time, the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads will have plenty of time to bring in a bill correcting them—a bill in the interest of the people as against the corporate interests of the country—thereby correcting many of the abuses now existing in the postal service; and I charge that many of the members of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads know of these evils, but up to this time have seemingly had no thought of correcting them.

In my judgment, it would be well for every representative body, whenever and wherever assembled together, to ask itself the question: "What are we here for? Are we assembled for the purpose of representing the corporate interests of the country, or are we here to represent the toiling masses, who have made the world what it is and without whom it could not exist in a progressive or material sense? Are we here to inaugurate reforms or to encourage graft and greed?"

Corporation representatives have no more business in a legislative body of the people than two-faced church members have in the church, and the sooner both organizations are rid of them the better off they will be. I therefore call the attention of the people of the country to the fact that it is necessary for them to examine the record made by this body closely, in order that they may be able to visit the proper punishment on those Members, if any such are here, who vote to plunder the people's Treasury in order that the corporate till may be filled.

Sir, the present Post-Office appropriation bill is the largest that was ever presented to the Congress and carries the stupendous sum of $191,373,848.75, and notwithstanding this large amount, it is estimated by the committee that there will be a deficit of more than $10,000,000 for the next fiscal year.

Mr. Chairman, the people would like to know why such deficits should exist in the face of such an enormous appropriation. They would like to know why the Post-Office Department is not to live within its income. They know that every post-office in the country pays its own way; in fact, that its revenues exceed the expenditures, and hence they can not understand why every other branch of this great departmental service can not be kept within the bounds of the appropriation made for its support. They know that every well-conducted business does not tolerate an expenditure, long at a time, that is greater than its income. Therefore they can not understand why, if it is necessary in order to overcome the deficit, a reform can not be made here and there that will bring about such a happy result. They know that the salaries of the postmasters of the large cities of the country could be cut a very respectable per cent without materially embarassing the recipients or taking from them any of the necessaries of life.

They know that the postmaster of the city of New York does but little more work than the postmaster of some office where the salary is much smaller, and that his extra work is confined principally to signing his name to such papers or documents as may be presented to him by assistants that the Government provides him with to prepare them, his chief business being to sit in his well-appointed office and sign his name when his subordinates lay papers or documents before him and request him to attach his signature thereto.

I know, sir, that these postmasters do not labor as do those who support the Government by their toil. Hence, I say that no great injustice would be done if the salaries of these high-salaried officials were to be cut in a reasonable degree and thereby remove a part of the burden from the shoulders of the masses.

But, sir, the salaries of postmasters, as an evil, pale into insignificance in comparison with the great mail-carrying evil, if such facts as I have been able to gather from reports of committees, duly appointed to the task of investigating the iniquitous evils of the railway postal service of the country, are true, if such facts set forth by reputable newspapers and other worthy publications are correct, and, sir, I am prepared to believe the statements of such committees and publications as against the statements of Congressional railroad attorneys who appear in this House in favor of the excesses of the railroads as against the people's rights, then the railroad mail-carrying evil is stupendous.

It may not be generally known, but it is a fact, if the hearings before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads are true, that about $45,000,000 are appropriated each year and turned over to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to be expended by him for railroad mail services without any check whatever upon his action. The hearings show that he reports to his clerical force the amounts to be paid to the railroads monthly, and that they make out the checks for the payment thereof without opportunity of investigating the correctness or incorrectness of the report, and the Treasurer cashes the checks without question.

Ah, gentlemen, the thought of $45,000,000 being turned over to a hired official to be disbursed by him annually without any check of any kind or character upon his work is enough to scare the average business man out of his boots. Such a proceeding would not be tolerated by any business man or business concern on earth.

Sir, is there any wonder that scandal and deficits occur in the Post-Office Department when Congress gives such a loose rein into the hands of a single official of the Government? It strikes me that instances of governmental extravagance and recklessness in the Post-Office Department could be multiplied almost indefinitely.

It is reported by an authority that I do not doubt that we pay more for transportation of mails than all the other countries of the world combined. In the last year for which comparative figures are available—1901—it cost us $38,500,000 for railroad transportation of mail alone. All the other countries of the world paid for transportation by all means only $37,000,000, or $1,500,000 less than we paid to the railroads.

Freight and passenger rates have gone down, and they are cheaper in this country than abroad. The express companies pay the railroads about half the rate they charge the Government for postal service, and yet the Post-Office Department continues to pay for the transportation of mail just about as much as it did thirty years ago. It was the boast of Members of this House, who opposed the Hepburn railroad rate bill when it was being considered by it a few weeks ago, that the railroad tariffs in this country were cheaper than anywhere else in the world, and they argued that as a reason why the Interstate Commerce Commission should not be given power to substitute a just rate for an unjust one.

If, therefore, conditions are such that railroads in this country can charge a much lower tariff rate in the United States than they do in other countries, why is it that they can not carry the mails of this country as cheaply as they can abroad? If statistics are correct, we are paying three times as much for the transportation of our mails over the railroads as England is paying for the same service over its railroads.

It is reported, and I have seen no denial of the fact, that we pay the railroads for mail service twice the amount per number of pounds that we pay star-route carriers for a similar service. If it is our purpose to do the right thing by all persons or agencies concerned, it would seem, from the fact that we are paying star-route carriers about one-half what we are paying the railroads for the same character of service, that mail can be carried cheaper by coach than by rail. But, if so, why is it that freight can not also be carried cheaper by coach than by rail?

It is stated as a fact, and not denied, that freight can be and is hauled by railroads at about one-tenth of what it costs to have it hauled by wagon. If these facts are true—and I do not see how anyone can doubt them—we are either doing the star-route carriers a great injustice, or else we are suffering ourselves to be perennially robbed for the benefit of the railroads.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, why this inequality, this injustice in the pay of star-route carriers and railroads for the same kind of service? I will answer by saying that one reason is that some of the Representatives in this House do not know, nor will they take time to inquire, of the inequality.

But a second and, in my judgment, a more far-reaching reason is that the railroads are better represented in both Houses of Congress than are the star-route carriers, and hence are guarded against anything which tends toward the reduction of the price paid them for the service they perform.

Another inequality shown by the Department between them is that the star-route carriers are required to enter into competitive contests for the privilege of carrying the mail, and the lowest bidder is given the contract; and in many instances it forces him to underbid himself, while the railroads are not forced to compete with each other for the privilege of carrying the mail, but are paid just such price as they say they will carry it for.

Notwithstanding it is clearly shown that the United States is paying more for the carrying of the mails over the railroads than all other countries combined are paying for carrying their mails by all agencies and instrumentalities, and notwithstanding it is clearly shown that the railroads are discriminated in favor of as against the star-route carriers by at least 50 per cent, still we have Representatives upon this floor who are presumed to represent the people, not the railroads, who loudly clamor in favor of the continuance of so unjust a policy and who strenuously oppose any righteous reform that is offered by a Member who considers the masses as against the classes.

Sir, I fully understand that matters have gone from bad to worse in this House, until it is considered demagoguish for a Member to raise his voice in behalf of the people. The moment he does it the special corporation leaders of both sides of the House are ready to ridicule and speak slightingly of his efforts in behalf of those who sent him here. I, for one, spurn their criticisms and have a perfect contempt for those who resort to them.

Mr. Chairman, in addition to the outrageous price we are paying the railroads per pound for carrying the mail, we are paying them a rental of from $5,427 to $20,000 per annum for each postal car used in the service, while the cars themselves do not cost more than $17,000 for construction. Thus, in some instances, it will be seen that we pay $3,000 per annum more for the use of a car than it costs to construct it.

And that is not all. The hearings before the Post-Office and Post-Roads Committee, while it was preparing the bill that is now before the House, disclose the fact that we pay $5,427 per annum for each of 215 postal cars that are standing in the car barns throughout the country, the total amount paid out for that purpose being $1,166,805. The argument used by the friends of the railroads in justification of such an outrageous act is that perhaps a wreck might occur on some line of the railroad and a car be damaged or destroyed, and hence, in order to facilitate the service, it would be necessary to have a car standing in a shed somewhere to take the place of one so crippled or destroyed. That kind of argument may sound good to railroad advocates, but it does not appeal to me.

You might as well tell me that the Government ought to pay rent on a building in a different part of town from the post-office other than the one in which the office is maintained, for fear a fire or cyclone might destroy the one in use and thereby necessitate the use of another, or, to use a country-grown comparison, that when a farmer employs a laborer and his mule for so much a day, he ought to be required to pay for an extra mule, standing in the barn, for fear the one in the plow might get sick. It would be just as reasonable to require the Government to pay rent on the extra house in order that the party from whom it rented might carry out his contract in case of a fire, or the farmer pay for the extra mule in case the one in use should get sick, in order that the laborer might carry out his contract, as it is to require the Government to pay for idle cars, in order that the railroads can fulfill their contracts for carrying the mails.

Sir, the thought of taking from the people, while they sleep, the sum of $1,166,805 to enrich the coffers of the railroads of this country, when nothing is given by them in return therefor, is so repugnant to my sense of justice that I can hardly find parliamentary language with which to express myself in regard to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MACON. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Government pays for the rent of cars that are not used?

Mr. MACON. Yes, sir; 215 of them per annum, according to the statement made before the Post-Office and Post-Roads Committee by the official who does the paying for them. He himself says there is no justification at all for such an expenditure.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, with such practices as that connected with so important a part of this Government, is there any wonder that scandal after scandal should occur in it? The wonder to me is that the people in their might do not rise as one man on election day and smite a political party to death or strike down the political aspirations of any or all of the Members of either branch of Congress that indorse such things with their votes.

If a majority of the Members of this House will vote with me to defeat this bill, or will vote to recommit it to the committee, with instructions to strike out these evils and bring in a clean and wholesome measure, we will be rid of them before another week.

But, sir, the railroads, not being satisfied with the enormous amount we pay them under outrageous contracts for carrying the mail, take a further dip down into the pockets of the people and purloin more of their hard earnings from them by padding the mails.

In evidence of that fact I will here incorporate in my remarks a purported interview with a certain Senator upon that subject, which appeared in the Washington Post of February 22 last:

A United States Senator, chatting with the writer yesterday on the subject of padding the mails, told how he had for four years been accessory to the fraud without knowing it. He laughed over the manner in which he and several of his colleagues had been victimized by a shrewd railroad employee, who masqueraded as a clerk of a Congress committee.

"This fellow came to me," said the Senator, "and asked me if I had supplied the Agricultural Yearbook to all of my constituents who had applied for it. I told him I had not, as the demand for it was very great and I had exhausted my quota.

"'That's all right,' he said; 'I've got a lot of copies, and I'll send them out for you.'

"I thanked him, and offered to pay him a reasonable sum for the books, but he declined the offer, and said he would be glad to accommodate me. I paid little attention to the matter, thinking that some Senator or Member had turned over to the fellow a lot of books, which is not a remarkable occurrence. Several of my colleagues happened to mention that the same fellow had accommodated them in the same manner. We regarded it as quite a favor, and I took it for granted that that was what the fellow wanted—to put us under a small obligation to him.

OBLIGING AT ALL TIMES.

"This thing occurred several years in succession, as I remember it now. Finally one spring the fellow came to me again and asked if I had exhausted my quota of Diseases of the Horse, or the Yearbook, or whatever it was. As usual, I had, and as usual he offered to supply a lot. I had my secretary turn over to him a whole lot of franks already addressed to people in my State, as this man said it would be more convenient for him to handle the books himself.

"A week or so later I asked him if the books had gone out, and he said 'no.' He gave some excuse that I can not recall. A few days after that I met him again, and he said: 'Those books have all gone out.' I offered to pay him for his trouble, but he declined payment. I said to myself: 'That is a pretty nice kind of a fellow and I'll try to help him when I can.'

"The next day I happened to see an item in the newspaper to the effect that the Post-Office Department had begun the weighing of the mails in the section that includes my State. A light suddenly dawned upon me. 'Aha!' said I to myself, 'this explains, possibly, why I have been getting something for nothing.'

"I did a little quiet investigation, and learned, to my own satisfaction at least, that this fellow was in the pay of a certain big railroad company while acting as a committee clerk or messenger. I am satisfied that he was put in the place he occupied for the very purpose of padding the mails. At a rough calculation I had been an innocent participant in a fraud that swelled the mails to the extent of at least 2,000 pounds annually for four years. As this fraud was perpetrated every year and the weighings are held in different sections every year, this fellow's work was evidently for the benefit of several railroads in different parts of the country.

"My colleague from my own State fell into the same trap, and he was one of the best lawyers in the Senate. Several other Senators told me they had accepted similar 'favors' from this same fellow. I suppose he must have sent out at least 10,000 pounds of books and documents during the weighing period. After this experience I have to smile when I read the solemn assurance of railroad representatives that it is impossible to stuff the mails and thereby increase the railway mail pay."

If the Senator's statement is true—and I do not doubt it, because so reputable a newspaper as the Post could not afford to publish it unless it were true—I can't see how the people can help but wake up.

It has been urged upon this floor by the railroad representatives that one of the reasons why we have to pay the railroads as much as we do for carrying the mails is that we require them to make certain scheduled time, and that if they fail to make it, they are fined a considerable amount.

To contradict that argument I will here read a clause of an editorial in the Washington Post, under the caption of "Railroads and the Government," and let you judge from it as to whether you think the argument about fining railroads for failing to make time will hold water. It is as follows:

What can the Post-Office Department do? Can it compel the railroads to maintain the fast schedule by imposing fines or making deductions for a failure to arrive on time? Perhaps it can, but it does not do so. According to the admissions of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to a Congressional committee, the practice of fining railroads is practically obsolete.

Judging from the article just read, I am constrained to think that there is such a close and intimate relation existing between the Post-Office Department and the railroads that it shuts its eyes to every failure of its pets to make the time required under the contract schedule. That kind of practice, of course, occurs by reason of the fact that the representatives of the people have allowed the large interests of the country to influence them too much in the matter of legislation.

Let the railroads get behind any species of legislation that comes before this body, and you will find many of its Members immediately becoming interested in the matter. But when you ask them to give a justifiable reason for their support of it, the only answer they can give is to throw up their hands, look wise, and say, "It's a good thing for my section of the country."

To illustrate my point as to that, I will say that we find many southern Members of the House supporting the following iniquitous provision of this bill:

For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Washington to Atlanta and New Orleans, $142,728.75: Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

And when you ask them for a sane reason for their support of it, they can only say that it is building up a southern industry; but when you ask them to tell you in what way it is building up a southern industry, ask them to give you a single instance as to who has been benefited by this subsidy except J. Pierpont Morgan, the owner of the Southern Railroad, they can not do so.

But, sir, from some strange cause, they grow red in the face when you call this graft a subsidy, and most earnestly deny that they would support a subsidy at all.

But let's see what a subsidy is and see whether or not they are supporting one in this instance. The definition of "subsidize," as given by Webster, is "to furnish with a subsidy; to aid or promote with public money, as to subsidize a steamship line." The definition of "subsidy," as given by Webster, is "a grant from the Government to a private person or company to assist in the establishment or support of an enterprise."

Now, sirs, exclusive of this $142,728.75, the Government is paying the Southern Railroad $1,227,437.09 per annum for carrying the mail from Washington to New Orleans, which seems to be a pretty fair compensation for the service given. Therefore, when we appropriate $142,728.75 as additional pay to the same road for carrying the mail, is it not "a grant from the Government to a private person or company to assist in the establishment or support of an enterprise," and hence a subsidy pure and simple?

For the life of me I can not see the difference between subsidizing a railroad to carry the mails from Washington to New Orleans and subsidizing a vessel to carry it upon the ocean; and yet my southern colleagues know that if they were to support the iniquitous ship-subsidy bill now pending before this body their constituents would retire them from Congress so fast it would make their heads swim.

I insist, Mr. Chairman, that this sum is a pure gift from the Government to the Southern Railroad and that not one single cent of it is necessary for the maintenance of the mail service upon said road. As evidence of that fact, I will now submit what the Second Assistant Postmaster-General said about it when he was before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, giving estimates as to the amount necessary to be appropriated for the next fiscal year for the maintenance of the postal service. He says:

We have not asked Congress to give it. We pay it out simply because when we have not asked for it, when there is no demand on the part of the Department for it, you still insist and pass the law. We regard your action under such circumstances mandatory and imperative upon us to obey and pay the subsidy.

Mr. MOON. Then, General, let me come down to the very bottom question of administration: Do you want this money or not?

General SHALLENBERGER. We are not asking it nor expressing an opinion in reference to it.

Mr. MOON. What is the reason that you all are silent on that question?

General SHALLENBERGER. We are not silent.

Mr. MOON. You say you do not ask it.

General SHALLENBERGER. We do not estimate for it.

Mr. MOON. And what is the reason you do not ask it?

General SHALLENBERGER. Because we think that the effect upon the service at large is better if we do not select any particular route in any particular section for special favors.

Mr. MOON. Then you do not select it because you think that it is a bad example, and that it affects the Railway Mail Service elsewhere to give this subsidy?

General SHALLENBERGER. That is the situation.

Mr. MOON. That is the situation. So you think that for the good of the service the thing ought not to be done, taking the country at large?

General SHALLENBERGER. Why, I think for the good of the service at large it is better that no special favors be given to any one particular road or system.

You will observe that there is not a single line or word in what General Shallenberger said that even indicated that any part of this appropriation was necessary. When the committee put the proviso to the paragraph which provides "that no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service," it thought to throw the burden of this expenditure upon the Postmaster-General, and when he was interrogated as to why he spent it, if it was not necessary, he said:

Although on its face it appears to be a discretionary power, yet when Congress, after full debate, year after year, has put this provision in the bill and made the appropriation, the post-office authorities can not construe it otherwise than as indicating the wish of Congress that it shall be spent, and have understood it as mandatory.

And in his report to this Congress he recommends against the appropriation of it. No Postmaster-General has recommended it in ten years, but, to the contrary, they have all insisted that there was no longer any necessity for it; and yet, in the face of all these recommendations and protestations against it, the friends of the railroads in Congress have been able to force it through the House.

When this matter was before the House in the last session of the Fifty-eighth Congress several Members made speeches against it and denounced it as a rank subsidy; but when the chairman of the committee closed the debate upon the subject he said that it was no more a subsidy than was the appropriation for the levees on the Mississippi River or for the one to pay the carriers on the rural mail routes of the country. And I am sorry to say that several southern Members applauded his declaration to the echo.

I heard one Member, whose constituents are greatly benefited by the levees on the Mississippi and who was among the number that applauded the chairman of the committee, say that his speech was one of the greatest he ever heard in the House.

Those of us who are opposed to graft and subsidies failed to discover anything great in it, and I now say that it was nothing more nor less than an attempt upon the part of one who had conducted an improper appropriation through the Post-Office Committee and was endeavoring to conduct it through this House in the interest of a great railroad company to pour balm upon the lacerated consciences of those Democrats who in the very teeth of their party platform voted to maintain a subsidy. [Applause.]

Sirs, I now boldly charge that, in my judgment, every Democrat who tramples upon his party platform and supports this proposition for special mail facilities on the Southern Railroad has received special benefits at the hands of that or some other railroad. There is no other way to reconcile their conduct, and there is no other conclusion I can come to and be honest. And, sir, I shall now take my seat for a few moments and give any Member who has supported this measure an opportunity to arise in his place and deny the charge I make. [Takes his seat and waits for Members to arise.]

Ah, Mr. Chairman, there is no response. I therefore call the attention of the country through you, my colleagues, and through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to the fact that I have made the charge and that no Member who is supporting this proposition dare stand in his place and say that he has not received special benefits at their hands. Human nature is a safe rule to measure a man by when he comes to act upon matters of legislation, and when measured by it you will find that he is always on the side of the people as against the corporations and trusts unless he has received special benefits at their hands.

Reverting to the "great" speech of the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, when he said that the appropriation for levees on the Mississippi River is a subsidy, I make bold to say that he is too intelligent a man to believe such stuff himself. Three-fourths of the States and Territories of this Union either shed all or a large per cent of their water into the Mississippi River, and it is rushed down upon the people who live along the lower parts of it in great volumes, threatening devastation and ruin to life and property; and hence, in comity, in justice, it is nothing but right for them to join in an appropriation to save the lives and the property that their floods would otherwise destroy.

Again, sir, by constructing levees upon the Mississippi River the Government preserves or reclaims a magnificent territory, the richest in all the world, and settlers from almost every State of the Union, since these leeves have been constructed, have located upon the lands protected by them and are now making their homes upon them and are receiving a handsome return on their investments.

In view of the definition of the word "subsidy," I would like to know what right anyone has to say that a policy that will reclaim a section of country for settlement that is far richer than that of the valley of the Nile, or of the Po, or any other valley of which ancient or modern history teaches, is a subsidy; and for the benefit of those who would like to answer my question in regard to that matter, I will now repeat the definition of the word "subsidy:" "A grant from the Government to a private person or company to assist in the establishment or support of an enterprise."

Therefore, when the Government appropriates money to construct levees, it is not a grant to a private person or company to assist in the establishment or support of an enterprise, and no fair mind can twist it to a point where it will be susceptible of any such construction. And when the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads attempted to do so he simply intended for what he said to be used as a lotion to heal the wounds that Democrats themselves inflicted upon their consciences when they voted for this iniquitous special mail facilities appropriation. And the argument of the chairman to the effect that rural free delivery is a subsidy, which received applause from these same Democrats, was nothing more or less than a job lot of rot.

The idea of this Government giving to the toiling masses of the country one mail a day during the week days of the year being characterized as a subsidy must certainly be the emanation of a diseased mind. It certainly is not founded upon fact or reason; and the thought of Democrats applauding such a sentiment offered in justification of their act in voting for a real subsidy is enough to disgust all persons whose aim it is to do right by all of the interests of the country.

A majority of the constituents of every Democrat from the South who is supporting this subsidy, and who applauded the sentiment that the giving of a single mail a day to the people on rural routes is a subsidy, reside in the rural districts of our country; and if I am not mistaken in them, they will examine the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and see what Members of this House are so disregardful of their interests that they are ready to class their one mail a day with this subsidy and vote to give $142,728.75 to J. Pierpont Morgan, the owner of the Southern Railroad. [Applause.]

The facts disclose that there are five mail trains which pass over the Southern Railroad every day, aside from the two subsidized trains; and hence the people who live along that route receive their mail, independent of a subsidy, five times a day, while those who live in the interior receive theirs once a day.

I challenge each and every advocate of a subsidy for this railroad to justify this partiality of mail distribution between the people who live along the line of the railroad and those who live in the interior, and I will pause for them to do so now, if they can conceive of anything that justifies it.

Ah, sir, again they fail to respond, and I assert without fear of contradiction that they could not present a truthful response if they had from now until doomsday in which to do it.

I assert further that these gentlemen can not show a single business industry along the line of this railroad that has received or is enjoying any material benefit by reason of these subsidized mails. It is my judgment that whenever any business is conducted in such a rapid way as to require more than five mails a day from a given direction, it is time for its managers to resort to electricity, instead of relying upon the slow progress of steam transportation.

But gentlemen say, "These mails are going to the South, and we of the South ought to support this proposition." Why, sirs, I am as much opposed to a steal for the benefit of the South as I am for one for any other section of this country. Why, I had a Member to say to me a few days ago, in talking about this matter, that it looked like I was against everything that was intended to build up the South. I told him that I was against everything that was intended to be given to the plutocrats of the East under the guise of building up a southern industry.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, these arguments about building up the South at the expense of honor and integrity remind me of an incident that occurred nearly two thousand years ago, when the sponsor for all Satanic infamy took the Savior of the world upon a high mountain and indicated to Him that unless He did certain things He would be against the building up of the industries of a certain climate that is reputed to be ten thousand times hotter than that through which the Southern Railroad runs. [Applause.]

Ah, sir, I am ready to work against the building up of the South whenever it becomes necessary to rob and plunder the other sections of this country in order to build it up. God has favored the South in natural resources, climate, and conditions far above those that He has bestowed upon any other section of this country. He has given to us bluer skies, richer soil, and a more congenial climate than He has the other sections of this Union, and it seems to me that we would be either knaves or disciples of Mammon if we wanted to plunder the public Treasury in order to further advance the interests of a country so richly blessed. [Applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, as indicated in the beginning of my remarks, I have no hope of convincing a single railroad-sympathizing Member of this body who has resolved to give his influence for special benefits received at their hands; for it has been my observation that whenever a man determines to make his bed in hell, that moment he loses all respect for the Christian religion and can see no virtue in the Ten Commandments and no efficacy in the Sermon on the Mount. [Applause.]

Upon the same principle, when men decide to place themselves upon the side of the railroads and other corporate interests as against the side on which the people stand they can see no virtue in the people's cause or efficacy in the principles they proclaim.

It has been argued here by some of the Members from the South who favor this appropriation that they have been petitioned to do so by boards of trade, committees, and the like. That, sir, is an evidence of the weakness of the cause rather than of its strength, for whenever it is necessary to get up petitions to support a project that is already in existence you may know at once that it is unworthy and could not stand by reason of its own worth or merit. If it is a worthy project it does not need petitions to sustain it; and we all know how petitions are gotten up, what selfish influences are always behind them, and how easy it is to get the signature of anyone to a petition when only one side of the case is presented and an earnest appeal made to the desired signer. When an application is made to an executive for clemency in behalf of a worthy cause it is not necessary for the one that presents it to be loaded down with petitions and resolutions to support it. A straightforward statement of the facts is all that is necessary for him to be armed with, but if he wants to present a bad case, then it becomes necessary for him to secure a petition that will stretch across the confines of his county or of his State, thereby hoping to unduly influence the executive and wring from him something that he would not otherwise give. [Applause.]

Sir, when I see Democrats supporting a special interest of this kind, voting for a subsidy as iniquitous as this one is, it has the appearance of a political stampede to me. While I recognize the right of every man to be what he pleases in religion or politics, I can not see how he can be a Christian if he be a blasphemer, or a Democrat if he be a subsidizer. [Applause.] How can a Democrat complain of a northern Republican voting for a high protective tariff with which to build up the industries of the North if he can vote for subsidies simply because he says they are intended to build up southern industries. I have always understood that Democracy is founded upon principle and not upon expediency.

Ah, gentlemen, how can the gentleman from Alabama, who says he is opposed to the protective tariff that benefits the people of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and New York, be in favor of a railroad subsidy that he supposes will benefit somebody somewhere in the South, but can not show a single man, woman, or child who will be benefited by it. [Applause.] Sir, I can not understand it; and I would not have the heart to complain of the protectionists of the North, who want their policy to obtain in order that the steel trust may further plunder the people, if I stood ready to assist the Southern Railroad in its pilfering scheme.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, it would be amusing, if the question were not so serious, to hear the arguments presented by advocates of this appropriation. Did you notice on yesterday, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggested that this special subsidy was needed because the railroad that was to be benefited thereby traversed an unsettled territory, how quickly the advocates of the appropriation jumped at the suggestion. You never saw a brook trout snap at a bait quicker than they jumped at his suggestion. Yet the facts show that the Southern Railroad runs through the oldest and as well settled a part of the country as is to be found in the United States. Perhaps they know the reason they bit. I do not, and can only surmise.

The Government is indeed approaching a dangerous state when its representatives will allow special interests to control their actions upon questions where the people are interested, and unless an aroused public conscience speedily takes a hand in the administration of its affairs a point will soon be reached where the privileges of greed will have greater tribute paid to them than the rights of the people, and that, too, by their representatives in this body.

Mr. Chairman, there is enough improper appropriation in this bill to wipe out the deficit of the Government for the past fiscal year, and if it is recommitted with proper instructions, it can be pared down so as to produce that happy result without retarding or hindering in any way the honest discharge of every duty resting upon the Post-Office Department. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MACON. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER. I want to say that, so far as the principle for which the gentleman is speaking is concerned, I am in sympathy with him. I am opposed to this subsidy and shall vote against it. But I should like to ask the gentleman if he does not believe that gentlemen of high integrity can honestly differ with him in the views he entertains? And if so, if the gentleman ought not to address himself to the principle involved and not to criticism of Members who do not agree with him? I agree with the gentleman in all he has said in regard to this appropriation.

Mr. MACON. I will say to the gentleman that my criticisms have not been personal, but have been based upon the general rule of human action. Now, if that rule is at fault, then I am at fault. It certainly has not been my purpose to be personal.

Mr. RUCKER. I know of no rule of human action that justifies me in condemning your motives because you and I happen to differ. You may be as honest as I am, but my opinion is that gentlemen who differ from us may cast their votes in perfect honesty. I shall vote as the gentleman will vote, but I think we ought to concede integrity to other gentlemen as well as to claim it for ourselves. I know you and I are honest.

Mr. MACON. I thank the gentleman for his closing declaration, and I will say that in what I have said I have not charged any Members with being dishonest in his motives. I did say that when measured by the rule of human action men were usually on the side of the people and not on the side of great corporations; and I did say that it was my humble opinion that anyone who stood for this subsidy had himself received special favors at the hands of this or some other railroad, and I called upon any Member who did not occupy that position to deny it, and I took my seat and gave ample opportunity to do so, but there was no response.

But I insist, sir, that under no circumstances can my language be twisted into meaning that a Member was dishonest simply because he differed with me.

Mr. RUCKER. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that.

Mr. MACON. I, sir, am broad enough, I hope, to give every man the right to think upon all questions to suit himself. I do not pretend to be the keeper of any man's conscience, his politics, or anything else that is peculiarly his own, but I have a sincere conviction that causes me to express myself honestly upon any subject that may come before this House for consideration.

A man may be ever so honest in his purposes and yet be persuaded to do a thing that, if stripped of special interest, would appear to him in an entirely different light. I insist that special interests have often caused the downfall of many true and patriotic souls that were thoughtless enough to give ear to their seductive wooings.

No, sir, I do not believe that a single man who favors this appropriation is dishonest, but I do believe that in supporting it he is supporting something that is contrary to the best interests of the country, and I know it is contrary to the principles of the Democratic party. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MACON. I will yield to the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. SMALL. I desire to ask the gentleman if he has read the entire post-office bill?

Mr. MACON. Yes; I have read the whole of it.

Mr. SMALL. I desire to ask the gentleman if he is in favor of the so-called "subsidy" for carrying the foreign ocean mail to Haiti, which costs $40,000?

Mr. MACON. No, sir; I am not in favor of that or of any other subsidy.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman give us his reasons for that?

Mr. MACON. A sufficient answer to that would be that my party is opposed to subsidies. But I will say further that in my judgment subsidies have done as much, if not more, to curse our country than any other agency. But my time has expired, and I will leave the matter with the gentleman.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have a few minutes more in order to answer my question. I would like to know if he voted for the subsidy to Haiti in the last Congress.

Mr. MACON. I did not. I voted against the final passage of the Post-Office appropriation bill because of the subsidy evils it carried. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. SMALL. I ask that he have a minute more to answer my question.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I have not any time to yield. If the gentleman from Tennessee sees fit to yield he can do so. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I know the gentleman from Indiana will yield long enough for me to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request of the gentleman from Arkansas will be granted.

There was no objection.

[Mr. CRUMPACKER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I now yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, a person who ventures to speak in the comparative solitude of Saturday afternoon I think is entitled to one privilege which I shall ask, and that is that the few who are here will kindly keep quiet.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement recently made by the leader of the Republican side that no revision of the tariff would be allowed at this session, it might seem superfluous for a Republican to debate further this question; but the distinguished leader of the Republican party, though he has said that we can not vote, has not said that we can not speak. [Applause.]

There are those who really believe, and I am one of them, that the tariff ought to be reformed by its friends. We not only say we believe it, but we do believe it, and we know it needs no prophet to say that if it is not reformed by its friends it will sooner or later, and perchance sooner, be modified by those who, in my judgment, will bring to it neither the same kindly feeling nor the same degree of intelligence to deal with the question. It is not the first time in the world's history that it has been solemnly announced that present conditions should remain unchanged, and it will not be the first time in the world's history that such solemn resolutions have come to naught. So I purpose to-day not to discuss the tariff in any detail, but to call attention to one schedule which I have had occasion to examine. It is a schedule where it can be easily seen what effect it has produced upon prices. It can be easily seen who has got the benefit of the change in prices and who have paid the additional price. Whether those results are desirable it is for this House, and those whom they represent, to say. Doubtless they are desirable to those who reap the benefit, and how far they may influence others we shall see.

I will say, in passing, that I am by no means one of those who occupy time in denouncing what are called the trusts. The great business combinations in this country are to a large extent the result of the operation of natural economic laws. If any man or any corporation can in conformity with economic laws accumulate millions or hundreds of millions, I know no reason why the Government should interfere, and certainly I would be one of the last to rail at the results. But, Mr. Chairman, what I wish to present this afternoon is a somewhat different question—not, Shall the Government interfere and seek to dissolve any great combination of business interests that it may find, but, Shall the Government allow, by the operation of a law which it enacts, the building up of such a combination and the creation of enormous amounts of wealth which rest, and rest alone, upon the positive legislation of the Government?

Mr. Chairman, the article of lead is one of universal use. It is used by the rich and it is used by the poor. Lead is used in enormous quantities, for instance, by the great corporations that manufacture telephonic apparatus. It is used in enormous quantities by other great manufacturers, and it is used by the poor man who puts a sink in his kitchen and has a lead pipe to assist in carrying off the water. So there we strike something of universal use. Used as it is by all, any increase in the price of lead must be paid by all this multiplicity of users. If the price of a pound of lead is 5 cents instead of 3 cents, it is evident to every one that that additional price is paid by all the people of all sorts and kinds who either in private life or business combination have occasion to use lead. So I think that all will agree that any increase in the price of this article falls upon the entire community. If it falls upon a manufacturer it has one of two results. Either it lessens his profits or else it compels him to enhance the price of his goods, and that is paid by the consumer. If it falls upon the small consumer, of course he pays it himself, and therefore we may fairly say that the price of such an article as that should not be enhanced by the Government unless there are persons especially entitled to the Government's aid.

The next question that we come to is, Who reaps the benefit; who has derived the benefit of the duty which has been imposed upon lead ore and pig lead? Without at all wishing to join those who are vociferous in their attacks upon trusts, I would commend to the eloquence of any gentleman who desires to make that an object, as a most excellent example of what is claimed by them to be an evil, the American Smelting Company. I have taken the pains to have prepared statistics in reference to the company, and the organizations created by it, and which form a portion of it, which I shall very briefly state to the House, as the figures which I have thus collected are necessary in order to reach the conclusion which I shall seek to establish.

The American Smelting Company was organized in 1899, very shortly after the passage of the Dingley bill. It was made up by a combination of smaller companies, and was organized with a capital of $65,000,000, one-half preferred at 7 per cent and one-half common stock, which was afterwards increased to $100,000,000, one-half preferred and one-half common. Out of that hardy tree has grown a considerable number of vigorous offspring. There have been since organized and are owned or controlled by that corporation, first, the Federal Mining Company, with a capital of $30,000,000, $20,000,000 preferred and $10,000,000 common stock; next the American Smelters' Securities Company, with a capital of $77,000,000, $47,000,000 preferred and $30,000,000 common stock; last, the United Lead Company, with a capital of $25,000,000, $10,000,000 preferred and $15,000,000 common stock.

In reference to all these corporations we may safely say that the preferred stock that was issued not only represented the original cost of all the smaller or subsidiary companies which were taken into it, but more than that. It represented a valuation placed upon them higher than had ever been placed until this combination was made feasible, and I think we can say without the least danger of contradiction that the common stock of these various corporations represented not one dollar of property, but only the hope of a profit that would be made as a result of the combination. There is in this company more than $100,000,000 of common stock, and it is safe to say that every dollar of that is pure water requiring no filter; unadulterated by one dollar's worth of actual property going into the corporation above the preferred stock. Now, it is apparent that if a combination such as that can be made, and it is possible to create $100,000,000 of common stock based upon the hope of future profits, and if actual value can be projected into it, and the $100,000,000, more or less, thus issued can be rendered of large value, there is a possibility of the accumulation of the enormous fortunes which do undoubtedly at times stagger our minds in these present days of American development.

We now come to the effect of the duty. There is a duty imposed by the Dingley bill on lead ore of 1½ cents per pound. The duty on pig lead is 2½ cents per pound. The American Smelting Company, I believe, claims not to own the actual mining companies which dig up the ore, but it controls them. It is the only person that buys from them; it is the only person that smelts their goods; it is the only person from which their goods can be bought, so it has control of that portion of the lead production of the United States of which it has obtained control. Now, we have its own reports, Mr. Chairman, because the figures I have given are not obtained from loose talk, but are based upon the official report and statistics furnished in every case. In 1903 the American Smelting Company, according to its own report, controlled 85 per cent of the lead production of the United States. At the present time it undoubtedly controls, because it has added somewhat since them, 90 per cent. So of the lead sold in the United States 90 per cent is sold by the American Smelting Company. In other words, it has practical control of the market. Now, let us see what effect that has produced upon the price. In 1896 the price of pig lead in New York was 3 cents per pound. In 1899 the American Smelting Company was organized, the Dingley bill had been passed, and the price of lead was raised by it in the year 1899 to 4½ cents per pound. There is a very interesting feature that one studying the effect of tariff laws can easily ascertain. The difference between the price of a foreign commodity and the price at which it is sold in this country will not be equal to the amount of the tariff ordinarily so long as there is still competition in the business. In other words, though there may be a tariff of 2 cents a pound on lead, yet if there are a number of different competitors, each one endeavoring to cut down under its adversary, ordinarily the price in this country is not raised to the full amount of the tariff duty.

But when some one corporation or combination obtains practical control of the entire market it does what anyone would do; it raises the price to the full limit covered by the difference in the tariff. And so we find, coming down to January, 1906, that the price of pig lead sold in London was 3.65 cents per pound; that the price of pig lead sold in New York City was 5.6 cents per pound. In other words, allowing for the small fraction of a cent that the lead would cost to be sent from London to New York, the price that is now asked on lead, which is paid by every man in the United States, from the largest manufacturer to the smallest mechanic who builds a house or puts in a sink, is increased about 2 cents a pound. Who gets the benefit? The United States Smelting Company, controlling 90 per cent of the product sold in 1903—about 485,000,000 pounds. Its sales at the present time are at least 500,000,000 pounds. Assuming that it is only charging the difference of the tariff on lead ore, that amounts annually to seven and a half million dollars. If they get 2 cents more, the amount that is allowed on pig lead, it would amount to about $10,000,000. Let us take the lowest amount and we have an enhanced price for the lead sold by the American Smelting Company, according to its official report, of at least seven and a half million dollars.

There can be no dispute, Mr. Chairman, that this is made possible by the duty. In the absence of that people would buy lead in London and have it sent to this country. But we can come nearer. In the city of Toronto, just on the other side of the line, lead is purchased by manufacturers for from 2 to 2½ cents less than it is purchased by manufacturers in the same business that live in the cities of Buffalo, Rochester, and Syracuse. Without the duty the Canadian market, like any other foreign market, would be open to them.

Is the price, the enhanced price of 5.6 cents, for which pig lead is now sold in the city of New York necessary in order to cover the enhanced cost of lead in this country? In other words, if lead can be sold at London at 3.65 cents, and can be sold at Toronto at the same price, is it necessary to have a duty of 2 cents in order to cover the enhanced cost of getting out the lead in this country?

To that, Mr. Chairman, there are two answers. In the first place, I do not believe there is a man in this House or out of this House who believes that with the richness of American mines, with the facilities of American machinery, with the enterprise of American operators, lead ore can not be produced in the United States as cheaply as it can in any other part of the world. I believe it can be produced more cheaply here. [Applause.]

But there is another answer, Mr. Chairman. We have seen these corporations organized with, I will say, preferred capitalization of, roughly, $100,000,000, that represented, doubtless at a very liberal valuation, the cost of the various plants the capital that had gone into mines and smelters. Certainly they were entitled to a fair profit on that, and if it was necessary to have a duty upon lead, pig lead, or lead ore to enable those engaged in that business to obtain a fair profit, I for one would be entirely willing to support such a measure. But the report of the smelting company shows a profit, a net profit, for the last year of $9,000,000. Its report and that of the other subsidiary companies show that if the $7,500,000 additional cost of lead sold by this company had not been obtained; in other words, if the profits had been $7,500,000 less, it would have made enough to pay liberal dividends upon every dollar of preferred stock of these various corporations. In other words, the enhanced price of lead has furnished the possibility of paying dividends upon $100,000,000 of common stock.

The $7,000,000 which it is estimated the American Smelting Company and its subsidiary companies make by reason of this tax pays of itself a dividend of 7 per cent on a hundred million dollars. In other words, as the result of this specific schedule on lead—and here I come up to the precise question—it is possible to give value to a hundred millions of stock that represented nothing but the paper upon which it was printed, and the increased price of lead which has made this profit possible has been paid by every man that in the United States uses lead. Is a schedule to be forever retained that makes possible the creation of imaginary property and yields a profit on it, a profit which is paid by those who certainly are quite as much entitled to the benefit of the Government's friendly hand? Take the American Smelting Company. Its common stock when first issued represented no property. Some was sold early in its history at 20, 30, and 40, and that was clear profit. The subsidiary companies received preferred stock for their property and a vast amount of common stock as bonus, and the man who sold this and got 30 or 40 cents on the dollar did well.

But the more sagacious man who held on did better, because as a result of the enhanced price which the American Smelting Company, controlling 90 per cent, has been able to fix upon lead, all this stock has become valuable. It pays dividends. The last report of the smelting company showed that on its $50,000,000 of common stock it had earned 11 per cent. It is not necessary to trouble this House with the earnings of the other subsidiary companies. The common stock of the smelting company, which sold at first for 30 or 40, now sells at 160 to 170, and its friends say that there is yet before it a great future. The common stock of the Federal Mining Company has not advanced so much, but it has advanced over 75 points.

In other words, if the figures that I have submitted are correct, the common stock of these various corporations is now worth, at a present valuation justified by their earnings, at least $150,000,000. That is what it would sell for, roughly, to-day. That is what it is worth to-day, judged by the earnings it makes and the returns it is enabled to pay.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. GILLESPIE. I should like to know the gentleman's opinion whether from his investigation of that concern it does not exist in violation of the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. PERKINS. I do not know anything about that. I have not investigated that question at all. In these remarks, Mr. Chairman, I have wished only to call the attention of the House, and possibly the attention of some of those outside of the House who may sometimes read what is here said, to some practical phases of certain schedules of the tariff. It is to be considered whether if there are schedules which, when they are exposed to public attention will, as it seems to me, excite public animadversion, it is wise to say that for all time the consideration even of an item like this shall be closed to the House of Representatives. I should be loth to say, Mr. Chairman, that the tariff is the mother of trusts; but sometimes we do see an illegitimate child, a misbegotten monster, that does look as if it owed to the tariff its existence and its growth. [Applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMYSER].

Mr. SMYSER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have read from the Clerk's desk an amendment to the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment which the gentleman proposes to present later will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 27, lines 17 and 18, by striking out the words "twenty-eight million two hundred thousand dollars" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "thirty-two million four hundred thousand dollars: Provided, That not to exceed $4,200,000 of said sum here appropriated shall be paid to rural mail carriers for horse hire and wagon equipment."

Mr. SMYSER. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to increase the compensation paid to the rural mail carriers, and in presenting it I am not unmindful of the fact that the disposition of this House is to exercise the utmost economy in the expenditure of public money. But I am actuated in the presentation of this amendment with the belief that the rural mail carrier, as compared with the compensation paid to clerks and others in the mail service, is unjustly discriminated against. He does not receive pay adequate to the service he renders.

The clerical force here in the capital receives from $900 to $1,800 per year. The railway mail clerks receive from $900 to $1,400. I am not unmindful of the fact, either, that the railway mail service requires perhaps a higher degree of intelligence, of education, and physical endurance than the ordinary carrier, either in the city or on the rural routes. The railway mail clerk must be familiar and conversant with the geography of his country. He must know States, counties, towns, railroads, and railroad connections, so that the mail transported shall reach its destination in the shortest possible time.

It is true that they are on duty but one-half the time, but for the service they render their compensation is not, in my judgment, excessive. Ordinarily the average compensation of the city carrier is a trifle over $800 per year. His hours are no longer than the hours of the rural carrier; he has ordinarily paved streets and sidewalks to traverse, and is not confronted with the mud and snow and all that that the rural carrier must encounter, and the rural carrier must go day in and day out; and yet the highest compensation of the rural carrier is $720 per year. Out of that $720 per year he must provide his horse hire and horse keep and the wagon that he uses.

Until within a year ago the Government paid a part of this hire. That is now eliminated. The cost to the rural carrier per year for the horse hire, for horse feed, for maintaining his equipment, Mr. Chairman, is something over $200 per year. On last Tuesday morning, in my own town, as the carriers were starting out over their respective routes, I called them together and said, "What does it cost you to keep your horse; what are your expenses per year?" One answered me very promptly, and he could not have anticipated that the question was coming, "If I was at home I could give you the figures, but it is something close to $260 per year." I have from him an itemized statement of the expenditures that he made in maintaining his horse hire and his wagon, and fitting himself for the discharge of his duty. And these expenditures, as verified by his account book, aggregate $259. The length of his route is 24 miles, which he travels six days in the week regardless of conditions of weather or roads. His compensation for this service is $720 a year, out of which he makes the expenditure of over $250 for horse hire and equipment, and which does not leave sufficient compensation for the service rendered. I also have an itemized statement from several other carriers showing an aggregate expenditure ranging from $230 up to $280.

I have before me the last report of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General in which it is stated that in the last fiscal year over 8 per cent of the rural mail carriers tendered their resignations, because of underpay and for no other reason. It would be difficult to assign any other sufficient reason for so large a percentage of resignations in a particular service, except that of inadequacy of compensation for services rendered.

Mr. KEIFER. And for inability to buy their outfit.

Mr. SMYSER. Yes; and as the gentleman suggests, for inability to buy their outfit in the discharge of their duty. They are not only discriminated against; but I beg to remind gentlemen who are not familiar with the benefits of the rural mail service that there is no expenditure made, there is nothing that the Government does, that so commends itself to the rural community as the rural mail service. It is an education to the farmer; it makes intelligent people out of them; they write more letters; they take more papers and more magazines, and there is no citizen in the world that is so well informed on all public questions and so able to discuss them with discrimination, judgment, and understanding as the American farmer. [Applause.]

Moreover, Mr. Chairman, it is a benefit to him in another way. The daily rural mail takes to him the daily papers. He is just as well posted upon the market as the men engaged in handling the various products. It enables him, by keeping track, by having knowledge of the conditions of the market, to sell his product at the highest price, and he is diligent in keeping himself informed as to the condition of the market. We need have no fear that the expenditure of this kind is going to meet any adverse criticism. The increase in the proposed amendment is just and due to the rural carrier. It will enable him to render more valuable service and feel that at the end of the year he has something left.

This service grows daily; it is here to stay, not only to stay, but to expand. There are about 35,000 rural carriers now. The amendment that I have had read, Mr. Chairman, and that I propose to press upon the attention of the committee at the proper time, contemplates an increase in the compensation of the rural carrier at the rate of $10 per month.

I have said that the rural carrier is unjustly discriminated against in that his compensation is less than provided for in other like governmental service, and that no provision is made for his necessary expenses. The rural carrier for some reason is not put on an equality with the city carrier. Why, curiously enough, in this very bill, for the city carrier, you have provided horse hire; you have provided transportation over the electric railway and for special messenger service; and why in the city the carrier should be provided with horse hire and transportation over the electric route to take him to the destination where his service begins and not accord that same privilege and same right to the rural carrier I do not comprehend. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. KEIFER. I want it stated whether a one-horse outfit is sufficient ordinarily when carrying the average distance that these rural carriers have to travel daily, say 25 miles.

Mr. SMYSER. In answer to the question I will say that in my county the average route is 24 miles. These carriers have to have two horses; one horse can not stand the work in continuous service.

Mr. KEIFER. They own the horses themselves, and wagon?

Mr. SMYSER. Yes; the whole outfit.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I wish to emphasize all that was said by the last speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMYSER], with reference to the rural free-delivery service and the compensation of the carriers on these rural routes. In my judgment, the value of this service to our agricultural interests, and therefore to the country at large, is in no danger of being overestimated. And it is certainly true that the letter carriers in this branch of the service are the most poorly paid class in the public service. We who have been especially interested in establishing and maintaining and developing this service have had it thrown in our faces whenever we have sought to secure a living wage for these letter carriers that there was a tremendous deficit in the revenue of the Post-Office Department, for which this rural service was mainly responsible.

First of all, I wish to protest against the bookkeeping which demonstrates the existence of this apparent deficit in the revenues of the Post-Office Department, amounting in the last fiscal year, in round numbers, to $14,600,000.

In point of fact, there is no deficit in the revenues of this Department. The fault is with the bookkeeping. Because of the existing system of bookkeeping the Post-Office Department is made to carry the burden that naturally and properly belongs to the other Executive Departments of the Government. I refer to the franking privilege, which is exercised not merely by the Post-Office Department, but by each of the other Executive Departments. Under this franking privilege the Post-Office Department is compelled to pay the expense of carrying the free mail matter sent out by the Agricultural Department, the Treasury Department, the Department of the Interior, the Department of War, the Department of the Navy, the Department of State, the Department of Commerce and Labor, and the Department of Justice.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This franking privilege is exercised by the legislative department also.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. That is true. We exercise it. It is exercised by the legislative department, and the whole expense is piled upon the Post-Office Department, and thereby it is made to appear that there is a deficit. The papers of the country exploit the tremendous deficit in the revenues of the Post-Office Department and cry out against its administration, and we are called upon to exercise better economy in connection with this Department. So we are restrained from providing reasonable compensation for the letter carriers on these rural routes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is it not a fact that the Government last year lost $27,000,000 in carrying second-class mail matter, of which the newspapers are the beneficiaries themselves?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Yes; Mr. Chairman, my friend the gentleman from Tennessee is right; or rather, in my judgment, his estimate is too low. I believe that I can demonstrate to the satisfaction of any fair-minded man that during the last fiscal year the Post-Office Department expended nearly $30,000,000 for carrying and distributing the newspapers and magazines of the country over and above what it received from these papers and magazines.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to state that I think the deficit for the last fiscal year was nearly $15,000,000 because of the carriage of second-class mail matter.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I am attempting to show, first of all, that there is no deficit in the revenues of the Post-Office Department; that the apparent deficit is caused by the faulty bookkeeping which charges up to the Post-Office Department the $20,000,000 which is properly a portion of the expense of maintaining the other Departments of the Government, and should be charged to those other Departments. And secondly, I shall show that if this kind of bookkeeping was had in the Post-Office Department, and if then the Post-Office Department received from the newspapers and magazines of the country a fair proportion of the expense of carrying and distributing these publications, it would have a yearly surplus of at least $20,000,000.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to the fact that the newspapers who specially emphasize the fact of this deficit are themselves the largest producers of this deficit.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Again the gentleman from Tennessee is entirely right. These very newspapers that are the loudest in denouncing the Post-Office Department and Congress for the apparent deficit in the revenues of this Department are themselves beneficiaries to the extent of $30,000,000 per year.

But I repeat that if the proper method of bookkeeping obtained in the Executive Departments of the Government, the method that is employed in every first-class business establishment in the country, it would be found that there is no deficit in the Post-Office Department. In the years 1874, 1875, and 1876, as many of you know, these Executive Departments paid their own postage, and so we have a basis upon which to work out the proportion of mail matter sent out by the different Departments. It is found that during these years the average income from postage upon the mail matter sent out by these Executive Departments amounted to about 5½ per cent of the total income of the Post-Office Department from this source. Taking the fiscal year 1905 and this percentage as a basis, it is easy to figure out that the cost of carrying the mail for these various Departments for that year amounted to about $9,000,000. But this is not an accurate method of ascertaining the present cost of carrying the mail for these Departments. We have still a better one. In 1899, when there was a general weighing of the mail all over the country, pains were taken to weigh the mail which came from these various Executive Departments, and it was then found that 12½ per cent of all the mails carried by the railroads came free from these various Executive Departments. Now, figuring out the cost of carrying the mail for these various Departments for the year 1905 upon this basis, we find that it cost the Post-Office Department far more than $9,000,000. Congress from time to time since the restoration of the franking privilege to these Departments of the Government has extended the privilege. And we all know that the use of the privilege by the various Departments in sending out public documents has increased tremendously during the last few years. It is therefore safe to say that it costs the Post-Office Department annually not less than $20,000,000 to carry and distribute the mails sent out free by the legislative and other Executive Departments of the Government. But we will be entirely conservative to say that the expense of carrying all the franked matter, including that of the Post-Office Department itself, amounts to $20,000,000, and then allow $5,000,000 for the expense of carrying the franked matter of the Post-Office Department alone, and then there are $15,000,000 now charged to the Post-Office Department which in no way belongs to it, and which should be charged up to the other Departments of the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman pardon me, but how does he arrive at the conclusion that the proportion of the cost of the Post-Office Department itself could be as much as $5,000,000?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I do not for a moment concede that it amounts to any such sum, but I said that we could grant that it did cost that amount, and that, even then, there would be no deficit in the Post-Office Department.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Take, for example, the Agricultural Department. It sends out a great deal more, more than twice as much as the Post-Office Department.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. That is undoubtedly true, and I repeat that the more one investigates this question the more the conclusion is forced upon him that the Post-Office Department is carrying a burden of nearly, if not quite, $20,000,000 which belongs wholly to the other Departments. So, Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly apparent that instead of a deficit in the revenues of the Post-Office Department for the last fiscal year of $14,600,000, there was absolutely no deficit whatever.

And why should this vast sum, which ought to be charged up to the other Departments, be dumped upon the Post-Office Department, and an opportunity be given to the press of the country and to the people of the country, who are unfamiliar with the circumstances and the facts of the case, to cry out against the administration of the Post-Office Department and against its deficit? We should have a new method of bookkeeping. I am not asking that the Government should return to the old method, the method in vogue in 1874, 1875, and 1876. The experience of those years would not justify our returning to the method of requiring these different Departments to pay postage upon their mail matter. But sound business principles require that each Department should have charged up against it the amount that it costs the Government to carry the free mail matter which it sends out. It is properly and absolutely a part of the expense of maintaining and running the Department. Then, too, Mr. Chairman, there is another reason why this should be done. In that way we should be able to ascertain with more definiteness what these various Departments are sending out. We should have a chance to compare the amount sent out by the Agricultural Department with that sent out by the Treasury Department, by the War Department, and by the other Departments; and we should be better able to guard against the misuse of the franking privilege by any one of these Departments.

So, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we may well call upon the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to report to the House a bill embodying the necessary legislation in this behalf. We are powerless to act unless they do this. We all understand that there is a large amount of work involved in preparing this annual post-office appropriation bill. But the members of the committee ought not to consider that their labors begin and end with this work. They should go further and enable the House to enact the legislation necessary for the proper adjustment, the proper distribution among the various Departments, of the expense of the franking privilege. When this is done, and the Post-Office Department is thus relieved of its apparent deficit, we can proceed to look after the needs of its employees.

We offer our various bills here and have them referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. In the great majority of instances these bills are pigeonholed, and when the committee is asked with reference to them the reply is that the committee has not found time in which to consider them. You know how powerless we are to effect any general legislation in connection with this appropriation bill. The rule of the House prohibiting general legislation in connection with the annual appropriation bills is undoubtedly a wise one, but wise or unwise it is absolutely effective. Should we offer any amendment to this bill looking to the necessary legislation in behalf of this subject of the distribution of the expense of the franking privilege, the point of order would be promptly raised by the committee. I am not here to criticise the committee. We all know that it is a faithful, hard-working committee and that it exhibits great industry and careful research in the preparation of the annual appropriation bill. The members of the committee are constantly looking after the best interests of the Government and of the people whom the Post-Office Department serves. But, Mr. Chairman, we are not going to be satisfied unless the committee keeps in mind these other needs and affords us an opportunity to provide the necessary legislation to improve this service. And I was glad to hear my friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], who is a member of this committee, indicate in his instructive address that the committee intended in the near future to revise the present law respecting the postage on papers and magazines. As I indicated a few moments ago, it is apparent that the Post-Office Department expends nearly $30,000,000 in this behalf more than it receives. As this service is, in a way, for the benefit of the people, there is a propriety in the Government bearing a fair portion of this expense. But the present division is utterly inequitable. One-half of this $30,000,000 ought to be borne by the parties who send out these papers and magazines. When this is done the Post-Office Department will be a revenue-producing Department. Instead of a deficit we shall have a surplus of twenty or twenty-five millions of dollars, and we shall then be able to go forward and improve the other branches of the service.

I fully agree with the gentleman who spoke last [Mr. SMYSER] respecting the inadequate pay of the letter carriers on the rural routes. We do not pay them to-day a living wage. Seven hundred and twenty dollars is their maximum pay per year. Under the law they can not hold any other little office. The fourth-class postmaster is permitted to hold any other local office that will permit him to eke out his income, provided it does not interfere with the discharge of his duties as postmaster. But the carrier on these routes, although he may have considerable time at his disposal and is so situated that he could perform the duties of many of the minor local offices of his community, and thus add materially to his income, is not permitted to hold the most insignificant one. And we have circumscribed by law and by the rules and regulations of the Post-Office Department his privileges in the matter of earning any income outside his salary from the Government. The duties of his position are exacting. He must start out each morning rain or shine. While his task may not require the entire day, it takes so large a portion of the day as to make it impossible for him to engage in any other work. It is an expensive employment. The carrier must not only equip himself at the start with a span of horses and with a necessary vehicle, but he must maintain these horses and this vehicle.

Mr. JOHNSON. And they do not even get Christmas.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. No; they do not even get Christmas. Under the present arrangements they are given one or two holidays in the course of the year. But they are not permitted to enjoy Christmas as a holiday. The Government employees in the various Departments here in Washington are given thirty days leave with pay in addition to all the holidays. These rural carriers are only given one or two holidays in the course of the year. Beyond this they are not given one single day's leave of absence.

And, Mr. Chairman, there is one other matter in this connection to which I would like to call attention. We all know that every business man who has a large and diversified business takes great pains to see that each department is self-supporting. We ought to see if some means can not be devised by which these rural carriers could increase their earning power to the Government. I believe that a very simple way could be devised. Suppose we should pass a law providing for a special postal rate on packages between the post-office and the patrons on the several routes emanating therefrom. To-day if the farmer on one of these routes desires 4 pounds of nails brought him by the carrier, he can telephone the hardware man in the village, and the latter can take the package to the post-office and send it out by the rural carrier. But the postage is 64 cents, and therefore prohibitive. By making the postage on such a package 5 cents, and increasing it to 10 cents for a 10-pound package, it would be possible to greatly increase the postal business on these routes without in any way detracting from the efficiency of the service. The average weight of mail carried by these carriers probably does not exceed 50 pounds. The carrier could easily carry another hundred pounds. And I am firmly of the opinion that if the necessary legislation in this behalf was had, it would be but a short time before many of these carriers would be earning their $2 per day in carrying this extra postal matter and the service would be self-supporting. Then, again, we would hear less talk about a deficiency in the Post-Office Department because of the rural service.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask this? Is there any especial reason why the Post-Office Department should be self-supporting? If the interests of the country require the additions to the service, is there any more reason why the Post-Office Department should be self-supporting than any other Department?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. There is none, whatever. The points that I have been endeavoring to make are that the Post-Office Department is, in point of fact, self-supporting, and that with a correct system of bookkeeping it would be shown to be self-supporting.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the only self-supporting Department of the Government.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Absolutely the only self-supporting Department of the Government.

Mr. SIMS. The others are all deficits.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Yes; the other Departments are expenses upon the Government. The Post-Office Department is the only Department of the Government which does not cost the Government one single cent.

Mr. PADGETT. Is it not a further fact that if the Post-Office Department were credited with carrying the mails for the other Departments it would be a revenue producer?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Yes. I have already stated that if these different Departments were properly charged, as they should be, with the expenses of carrying the matter they send out, then the Post-Office Department would not merely have no apparent deficit, but it would be actually shown to be a revenue-producing Department. Then we would go one step further and require the newspapers and magazines of the country to bear a fair proportion of the expense of carrying those publications, and when we have provided a proper postal rate between the post-office and the routes emanating, respectively, therefrom, the Post-Office Department will not only be a revenue-producing Department, but one whose net revenues will amount to many millions of dollars per year.

The Post-Office Department is a great business enterprise. With all its ramifications it is one of the very greatest business enterprises in the world. It is conducted for the benefit of the people. It should be wisely and economically administered. If possible, it should be administered so that there will be no deficit. I do not mean to claim that in point of fact it should be made a revenue-producing Department. The Government should not expect to make anything out of the Post-Office Department, but it should be so administered as to afford the proper increase in its revenues to enable us to extend and develop and perfect the service and pay a living wage to every member of the vast army scattered all over this broad land and working, some by day and others by night, to transmit the messages of business and of love and of affection. [Applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the gentleman from Tennessee occupy some time.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield forty minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I shall invite the attention of this House for a short while this afternoon to a subject which is nonpartisan; and I shall repeat the request made by the gentleman from New York, that during the time I shall attempt to discuss this question I may have the attention of gentlemen who are present.

Mr. Chairman, I find in the message of President Roosevelt last year the following words:

> The power of the Government to protect the integrity of the elections of its own officials is inherent and has been recognized and affirmed by repeated declarations of the Supreme Court. There is no enemy of free government more dangerous and none so insidious as the corruption of the electorate. No one defends or excuses corruption, and it would seem to follow that none would oppose vigorous measures to eradicate it. I recommend the enactment of a law directed against bribery and corruption in Federal elections.

And again, in his message this year, the President took occasion to allude to corrupt practices which have obtained in elections in this country in the following words:

> It is entirely proper both to give and receive them (contributions) unless there is an improper motive connected with either gift or reception. If they are extorted by any kind of pressure or promise, express or implied, direct or indirect, in the way of favor or immunity, then the giving or receiving becomes not only improper, but criminal.

Again, I find that the eminent Secretary of State has also raised his voice against this vicious and indefensible practice. He used these words, speaking in the New York constitutional convention:

> The use of money has come to such a pass at the hands of both of the great political parties in this country that we find enormous contributions necessary to maintain party machinery—to conduct party warfare—and the effect is that great moneyed interests, corporate and personal, are exerting yearly more and more undue influence in political affairs.

There you have, Mr. Chairman, in two messages from the President of the United States, an emphatic recommendation in favor of the passage of some law which will put an end to what I believe to be the greatest blot upon the good name of this American nation. You find his Secretary of State, one of the most eminent men in the Republic, supporting the President in the most emphatic manner by the declaration I have read.

The other day I sent to the Committee on the Election of President and Vice-President a request that I be furnished with such bills as have been introduced for the purpose of putting an end to this practice. I find that nine bills have been introduced, some of them by Democrats and some by Republicans; some requiring publicity and a statement setting forth in detail the amounts contributed, who contributed it, and how it was expended. Other bills go a little further and make it unlawful for any corporation to contribute money intended to affect the result of an election.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I undertook to draw a bill which I believe is conservative, which I believe ought to pass. I am not an extremist generally about anything, and I thought that in view of the recommendation of the President of the United States, in view of his well-known attitude with respect to this practice, considering the admitted existence of the evil, the committee having in charge these bills should at least report favorably a bill making it unlawful for a corporation subject to the jurisdiction of the laws of the United States to give away the stockholders' money without the consent of every stockholder interested. Probably a stronger bill should be reported, but it seems to me that bill, so moderate and just, ought to pass, and I am sounding the alarm here this afternoon. Here are nine bills before that committee, and I am informed that the chairman of the committee having them in charge can not be induced to take action with respect to a single one. I may do him an injustice in making this assertion, but this is my information.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman permit an explanation?

Mr. POU. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER. I want to say that I am a member of the committee to which the gentleman has reference, and that every Democratic member of that committee and some of our colleagues on the other side have been diligently trying to induce the chairman to permit us to meet and vote on these very bills, indorsed by the President of the United States, introduced by Members of this House.

Mr. POU. I am glad that my distinguished and good friend from Missouri has exonerated at least the minority of that committee, and I am glad to hear from him the statement that there are Republicans on that committee who favor the enactment of some law similar to those bills as well as the Democrats, because I declare to you, Mr. Chairman, that this question is above every party and above all parties. The very life of the nation is involved in this corrupt practice, which has been already tolerated too long. [Applause.] The strange thing to me is that men who claim to be honest, and who are honest in every other respect, quietly and without protest permit these things to go on, when every thinking man must know that unless an end is put to this corrupt practice, sooner or later the Government itself, the greatest ever built up by man, may be overthrown in the disaster sure to follow.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to point out the danger of allowing this practice to continue. We are told, upon what seems to be good authority, that in the campaign of 1904 $1,900,000 were used. I say this, I do not believe that much money ever was used honestly in any one campaign. I am not going to be personal. I am not going to charge anybody with wrongdoing, because I do not know; but I do say that I do not believe any political party can have an honest use for $1,900,000 in one campaign.

Now, I do not care which way that cuts. I do not care whether it comes back home to my party or not, and I am here ready to admit that the guilt of either political party is probably limited only by the amount of money its agents can raise.

Let us be fair about this discussion. In 1900 $2,800,000 were used, so we are told upon what is accepted as good authority. In 1896, that year of all years, when some of the officers of these insurance companies were trying to save the honor of the nation by stealing the money that belonged to widows and orphans, trying to save the country from the disaster of the election of W. J. Bryan by robbery and theft that ought to put them in stripes—we are told that in that year $3,800,000 were used by the Republican national committee alone.

They go back to 1892, the year when a Democratic President was elected, and they tell us that in that year $4,100,000 were used. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that that may be true or it may not be true. If it is true, I have no defense for it under the sun. I regret it with all my heart and soul; but I want to say that I do not believe that in any campaign that has ever been fought out in this country, before or since, was there as much money used as there was in the campaign of 1896. [Applause.] I will say further that I am just as confident that in 1896 the election of Mr. Bryan was prevented by bribery and fraud as I am that I am living here to-day. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Our Republican friends hardly deny this in private conversation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the narrow margin that exists between the two political parties constitutes an ever-present temptation for the use of money. The men skilled in politics, the professional politician, the machine politician, the man who makes a business of politics, the gentleman who becomes an expert in producing results by the use of money, this man—for whom I have always had a profound contempt—this man always knows where the weak points are, knows where the votes are needed, and the result of it is that the money is always forthcoming from the interests which want and need protection in the halls of Congress. Respecting the statement of the President, whom I highly respect, that contributions are entirely proper unless there is an improper motive connected with either the gift or the reception, I will submit that contributions which have no such motive behind them are very small and seldom made at all.

Now, Mr. Chairman, at some pains I have investigated the narrow margins that have divided the two political parties since the year 1876. In that year Mr. Hayes received a majority of 1 in the electoral college. He received 185 votes, while Mr. Tilden received 184. That is to say, Mr. Hayes got 185 votes after the Electoral Commission had done its work. In that election the defeated candidate received a majority of the popular vote. Mr. Tilden's plurality was 250,807, or only a little less than 3 per cent of the entire vote cast. But, Mr. Chairman, in that election a change of 529 votes in one State would have elected Mr. Tilden, notwithstanding the Electoral Commission.

In 1880 General Garfield received only 9,464 votes more than his opponent, General Hancock. He received nothing like a majority of all the votes cast. He received a majority of 51 in the electoral college, but a change of 10,517 votes in one State only would have elected General Hancock and defeated General Garfield.

In 1884 the defeated candidate, Mr. Blaine, again received a trifling plurality in the popular vote; he received 25 votes more than his opponent, but was defeated in the electoral college by a majority of 37, and yet a change of 575 votes in one State alone would have changed the result of the election and conferred the great office on Mr. Blaine.

Coming down to 1888, again the defeated candidate received a plurality of 100,496 in the popular vote. This was a little less than 1 per cent of the entire vote cast. In the electoral college Mr. Harrison received a majority of 65, but a change of 6,502 votes in one State would have changed the result in that election.

In 1892 the successful candidate, Mr. Cleveland, received a plurality of 380,822, or about 3.17 per cent of the entire vote cast, and also received a majority of 110 in the electoral college; but a change of 26,322 in two States would have changed the result of that election.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we come to the year 1896, the year which was a Waterloo for the Democratic party. In that year the successful candidate received a majority of all the votes cast. His plurality was 819,952 votes, nearly a million. The plurality was overwhelming, and Mr. McKinley received a majority of 95 in the electoral college. But even in that election the change of 31,756 votes in four States would have elected Mr. Bryan and would have defeated Mr. McKinley.

In 1900 again the successful candidate, Mr. McKinley, received a majority of 456,259. But a change of 99,132 votes in four States would have made Mr. Bryan President even in 1900.

I have not examined the figures in the last election, but I present these figures for the purpose of showing what a slight difference in the popular vote will change the entire result. It is easier to raise money now than it was forty years ago. The wealth of our country has become so great and the interests of certain individuals have become so vast that the amount of money required to accomplish a desired result is hardly a consideration. Millions to-day are almost as common as thousands were half a century ago. The wealth of the United States in 1860 was $16,159,616,000; in the year 1900 it was six times as great, or $94,300,000,000. In 1860 the population of the United States was a little over 31,000,000, and in 1900 it was a little over 76,000,000. Therefore, while the weath of our country has increased six fold, our population has increased only two and one-half fold. The margin between the two great political parties since 1876, except in three elections, has been perhaps smaller than during any other period of equal length in the life of the Republic. The great increase in wealth has largely found its way into the hands of a few men. It is therefore easier to raise large campaign funds, and the temptation to use this money is correspondingly greater. I do not belong to that class—if there is such a class—who envy the man who is more fortunate in the possession of the world's goods than I am, and I give these figures, not for the purpose of arousing any feeling against the very wealthy, if it were possible for me to do so, but solely to sustain my argument and to show how easy it is for a few men to raise enough money to actually buy the result in an election.

The most reliable work, probably, on the subject of the concentration of wealth is that published by Rufus Cope in 1890. He quotes, with qualified indorsement, certain statistics prepared by Thomas G. Shearman in 1889. At that time the wealth of the United States was sixty-one and one-half billions of dollars. Two persons owned $300,000,000; 5 persons owned $500,000,000; 1 person owned $70,000,000; 68 persons owned $2,700,000,000; 70 persons owned 4 per cent, or one twenty-fifth of the entire wealth of the nation; 845 families, or about one fifteen-thousandth of the population owned one-eighth of the total wealth; less than one fifteen-hundredth owned three-sevenths of the total wealth, and one thirty-fourth of the population owned more than 70 per cent of the entire wealth of the country. Now, it has been repeatedly stated—and we all know that the newspapers publish nothing but the truth [laughter]—it has been stated repeatedly that there are four men in this country of ours whose aggregate wealth exceeds $1,000,000,000. For myself I am inclined to believe the statement is true. If it is true, it would require fifty-two trains, each with thirty cars, and each car loaded with 40,000 pounds of silver, to convey the wealth of these four men from one place to another.

Mr. Chairman, when we know that men are weak, when we know that votes can be bought, when we know that vast interests are at stake in every election, and when good men tolerate these corrupt practices without protest, is it strange that these millionaires do not hesitate to protect themselves by contributions of enormous sums for campaign purposes? In the year 1896 one insurance company gave $15,000 of money that belonged to whom? To the man that gave it? Not at all, but to me and to you and to other men who have policies in that company. I happen to be one of the unfortunate individuals. The officers of this insurance company stole that much money, part of which belonged to me, to help elect William McKinley President of the United States. In 1900 they stole $35,000 more. Why they wanted to steal it 1904 surpasses my comprehension, because I made quite a number of speeches in that campaign and talked with many well-informed persons, and I found nobody who thought that Theodore Roosevelt was in any danger of defeat at any time during the campaign. But, Mr. Chairman, in 1904 these same insurance officers went down into the coffers of their company and took $42,500 and contributed that money to Mr. Cortelyou to help elect Theodore Roosevelt President of the United States—committed a crime, because it was a crime, a moral crime if not a legal crime.

No wonder, Mr. Chairman, that the people are clamoring and that certain legislation longed for, prayed for by the millions who toil, encounters so many obstacles along the legislative pathway blazed out by the Republican party. No wonder that we are at the present time witnessing a struggle in the other end of this building between the railroads on the one hand and the people on the other. [Applause on the Democratic side.] No wonder that a cry is going up all over this country from the consumers that something be done to raise the burdens of the protective tariff, while $400,000,000 worth of goods are sent across the water every year and sold cheaper over there to Hottentots and to foreigners than the same goods are sold to our own people. No wonder the people want to know why something can not be done to remedy this evil. No wonder that, with hundreds of trusts violating the law every day in the year, the people are asking why it is more effective legislation is not put upon the statute books. I will tell you where I believe the trouble can be found. During every campaign these great interests take particular care to fix themselves with the political party they believe is going to be successful. Why did the Mutual Life Insurance Company give Mr. Cortelyou $42,000? Does anybody think the gift was prompted by a proper motive? No, Mr. Chairman; that money was given to put the Republican party under obligations to that company.

During my three terms in Congress not a single law has been passed which, in my humble judgment, was seriously opposed by the moneyed interests of the country. Everybody knows the trusts are violating the law every day in the year. Everybody knows that they fix the price of what they buy as well as what they sell.

Let us put a law upon the statute books which will make these contributions unlawful. Let us make this law plain and explicit. If it puts a Democrat in the penitentiary, for one, I favor the enactment and enforcement of such a law, and I submit that the time has come when men of all political parties should unite to pass a law which will purify the political atmosphere. Now, Mr. Chairman, when a few men raise a large sum of money and a sufficient number of votes are thereby changed to cause the election of certain candidates, such result is not the expression of the will of the people, but it is a result bought with money. It is not the administration of the people, but the administration of money. Men elevated to public position by this means are not the servants of the people. Unless they are possessed of rare virtue and almost superhuman strength of character they will primarily represent those who contribute to their election. Popular government ends and plutocracy is enthroned in power. The small percentages which change results and the weakness of poverty constitute an ever-present temptation to debauch the American electorate.

This is not a partisan question, I repeat, Mr. Chairman, but it is a great national problem which should engage the thought of every man who loves his country. The perpetuity of American institutions is involved; the liberty of the American citizen is involved; the happiness of posterity is involved; the Republic itself is involved. Everything which liberty-loving people cherish is at the mercy of this vicious practice. Shall this crime become respectable because all parties are guilty of it? Shall one party justify by charging that the other is guilty? Does the practice cease to be evil because it has become universal? Shall all protests be laughed to scorn? Has purity of purpose become impractical in the most important of all American institutions? God forbid! Mr. Chairman, an effectual way by which an end can be put to this practice is by political parties nominating for office only men who refuse to act as brokers in the distribution of these corrupt funds. Aye, more than this. The machinery of a great political party should be operated only by men who refuse to distribute stolen funds—embezzled funds. Good men everywhere should refuse to follow the lead of men who accept for political purposes money stolen from the fund which honest men have set apart for their wives and children. Let political parties refuse to put their machinery in the hands of men of shady reputation. Let the machine politician be put out of business.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have about concluded what I had intended to say. I rose here this afternoon for the purpose of reminding the country that the President of the United States has demanded this legislation in two messages; for the purpose of reminding the country that bills covering almost every phase of this evil have been introduced, have been referred to the Committee on Election of President and Vice-President, and I call upon that committee to act—to do something. Either say you are for these bills or against them; act one way or the other, and let the country know where you stand, and do not let this Congress adjourn with these bills sleeping in the archives of your committee.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. POU. With pleasure.

Mr. RUCKER. I would like to ask the gentleman how can members of this committee who are anxious to vote vote when they can not get a meeting. Please tell us that?

Mr. POU. You give me a nut too hard to crack. You are beyond me. Mr. Chairman, it seems that the minority of the committee is ready to act. Then I should say that the responsibility is upon the majority.

Mr. RUCKER. I want to be fair about it. I believe there are gentlemen of the majority who will vote with the minority at any time to pass some of these bills.

Mr. POU. Then, Mr. Chairman, I am glad that this discussion has fixed the responsibility where it properly belongs. There is somebody responsible for delay in this legislation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I am not certain of it, but I heard once upon the floor of this House from a Member several Congresses ago that a committee could, if it chose, elect a chairman when it was decided that the man who happened to be the first named from the Speaker's list——

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I never knew before—the gentleman never gave me the advantage of his long experience and great learning—that a committee could select its chairman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I did not give that as my statement; I merely say I myself heard that suggestion, and do not know whether that is so or not.

Mr. RUCKER. So far as I am concerned, I am ready to vote at any time to change the chairman and put somebody else at the head of that committee who will give an opportunity at least once a month for us to express ourselves upon these great questions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will pardon me, one other question. Has the committee a regular meeting day?

Mr. RUCKER. No; nor an irregular one, either.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was going to say that if it has a regular meeting and there is a quorum present, whether the chairman is there or not, the committee can proceed.

Mr. RUCKER. But we have no regular or irregular meeting.

Mr. SIMS. May I ask the gentleman from North Carolina whether the amount he has mentioned as being spent in these respective campaigns is money spent through the national committees?

Mr. POU. I am glad my friend called my attention to that. The amounts named were expended, so I am informed, by the national committees of the two parties.

Mr. SIMS. Is it not a fact that vast amounts are spent that do not come through the national committees?

Mr. POU. Undoubtedly. The amount is so vast, Mr. Chairman, that nobody can compute with any degree of certainty how great and vast it is. I am obliged to my friend from Tennessee for calling my attention to that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, just one word in conclusion. Four years ago I sounded this alarm. I was laughed at. Newspapers made fun of me. At the very moment the newspapers were trying to poke fun at me the officers of these insurance companies were stealing the money which belonged to policy holders to aid in defeating W. J. Bryan, one of the purest men in public life. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, at one time in the history of the world there was a man who kept rising up in the greatest legislative body then in existence to warn his people of a constant menace to their liberties. If I have not gotten my history mixed, Cato the Elder wound up every speech with the words "Carthago delenda est"—Carthage must be destroyed. At last Carthage was destroyed. I do not know how long I will be permitted to remain in this body, but so long as I am a Member, just so long as the constituency I am proud to represent continues to send me here, I will continue to sound this alarm, utterly indifferent to all ridicule, until something is done one way or the other, or until I am silenced by a return to the shades of private life. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, from the time when the venturesome sons and daughters of the Old World, impelled by ambition to improve their condition in life, began to migrate in any numbers to these United States their admission has been opposed by an inhospitable element whose size has fluctuated, combativeness abated at times, and influence frequently waned, but whose voice has never been hushed.

It fairly shrieked against the admission of the hardy visitors of sixty years ago, who, anxious to toil, came at a time when the young nation yearned for sturdy hands to hew the timber and clear the way into the great West, and capital in the East eagerly sought labor with which to prosecute great public projects. Notwithstanding that time has proven the folly of their reasoning, they still keep up the cry which has been taken up by the majority party. A great alarm has been sounded by the Republicans warning the people against the invasion of foreign enemies in the form of immigration, and with an alacrity and willingness that would win approbation if exercised against the tariff evils they start to build legislative walls that will halt the progress of the immigrant. Our naturalization laws, too, are to be remolded.

Radical changes will be wrought in our naturalization system unless there can be aroused sufficient interest to cause the Members of the House to carefully examine into the provisions of the bill now pending. It is my intention to-day to confine myself strictly to a discussion of the measure before the House, which proposes many remarkable changes in the method of naturalization. Against many features of the bill I propose to briefly address a few objections, with little hope of pausing the majority in its desire to hamper the alien's ambition to obtain citizenship. Undoubtedly one of the most perplexing problems with which the governor has to cope is that of the subject of naturalization.

It is apparent to everyone who has given a serious thought to the matter that our present laws are lamentably inadequate in preventing gross frauds in naturalization. I think that we are unanimous in the opinion that some change is necessary; that something ought to be done; that laws ought to be enacted which will bar the door of American citizenship to the perjurer, and the professional applicant, who for a price impersonates would-be citizens, and which shall insure the bringing to an end of the flourishing business of the dealer in citizenship papers, who sells his ill-gotten wares for magnificent prices to customers in Europe and the Orient, who covet the paper that permits them to masquerade as citizens of this country and guarantees the protection of its strong arm.

All these frauds are possible because of the great difficulty of apprehending the violators under our present laws. House bill No. 15442, reported by the Committee on Immigration, contains provisions which will unquestionably remedy these more dangerous abuses from which the country now suffers. Had the committee confined themselves to prescribing for the disease which weakens our naturalization laws it would have commanded the support of the entire House. But, like most bodies intrusted with the duty of formulating remedial legislation, it has fallen into the way of undertaking too much. It has gone too far. Instead of stopping with its commendable efforts of drafting a law that will unquestionably prevent fraudulent naturalization by perjury and impersonation it has tinkered with the whole system, offering remedies that are not only not required, but will prove harmful in the long run.

It has challenged the opposition of a great many by establishing an educational feature, by depriving certain courts of jurisdiction, and by reporting an uncalled-for and unreasonable increase in the naturalization fee. For long over a hundred years the world has marveled at the unparalleled development of this magnificent nation of ours. This wonderful growth has been due in no small degree to the humane policy that allows the oppressed of the world to land on our shores, and to the spirit of friendliness in which we invite them to join our common citizenship. [Applause.]

All we have asked them to do precedent to embracing citizenship is to indicate an intention of remaining with us by establishing a residence and later forswearing allegiance to the head of the government they had left. Under this humane policy our citizenship has expanded amazingly and our social and economic prestige and influence increased correspondingly. To sustain this proposition I need neither marshal statistics nor invoke the utterance or writing of a single philosopher, historian, or statesman. The magnitude, power, and grandeur of the nation are monuments which the toil, thrift, and patriotism of the immigrant contributed no small share in erecting. If an abundance of good and very little harm has come of absorbing into our citizenship these worthy foreigners, is there any need of alarm? Why not let well enough alone? We are agreed, all of us, upon the sound proposition that that alien who embraces citizenship is the most desirable. This being so, obviously it is sound policy to convert as many as we can into citizens. This can not be done with any degree of success if you insist in erecting a barrier in the path to naturalization which the alien will find impossible to get over.

How much better to allow him to enroll in our great book of citizenship, even if, having been denied an opportunity to educate himself under an unwholesome monarchical government, he is incapable of reading and writing. While I believe it unwise to make lack of education an obstacle in the way to citizenship, I am unswervingly opposed to extending the ballot to a citizen, newly made or one long in the enjoyment of this great privilege, who can not read and write. [Applause.]

At least this much education ought to be a prerequisite to voting. The ambition of almost every alien who becomes a citizen is to exercise the voting right. Make him a citizen and he will strive to acquire sufficient knowledge to qualify for the ballot. Citizenship adds zest to the desire to acquire the voting franchise. So far as we in Massachusetts are concerned, the imposition of an educational feature will not affect us in the slightest. Under the laws of our Commonwealth no man can vote who is unable to read our constitution and write his name. We find that this law works well. Our ballot is of such a character that it requires a knowledge of reading to intelligently vote it. The matter of limiting the courts that may naturalize I am not going to discuss, for I know it will be pointed out, and effectively so, that this will work a great deal of harm. To the provision of the increase in the naturalization fee I desire to enter a most emphatic protest. This bill provides a fee of $11. Just think of it! Eleven dollars represents a great sum to the poor alien whose first obligation is to his family and, as strong as may be his ambition to join our citizenship, he will be forced to surrender the hope when confronted with the payment of what is practically a prohibitive fee, as is this one. [Applause.]

In Massachusetts it costs $3 to be naturalized. Do you think it likely that a raise to $11 will prove an incentive to become a citizen? Undoubtedly not. We want all the aliens in our country we can get to become naturalized. He reckons soundly who does so from the premises that citizenship awakens in the former alien a keener interest, deeper love, and stronger pride in the institutions of our country. The establishment of a fee of the size fixed in the bill will minimize naturalization. It is unwise to argue that because the payment is made in three installments the burden will not fall heavily. The prospective applicant learns that it will cost $11 and will abandon the idea of becoming a citizen. It is a mistake, a grave mistake, which I trust the House will remedy. It is like inviting a man to your home and when he is seen coming bolting the door and turning a deaf ear to his knock for admission.

Believing that this unwarrantable increase in the naturalization fee will deter no end of aliens who would make desirable citizens from becoming so, I intend to offer amendments which will place the aggregate fee at $3. By rendering citizenship practically impossible of attainment by the alien who has the desire you will recruit the ranks of that dangerous element in society which is made up of those who have no voice in our Government, interest in her institutions, or concern in her welfare. [Applause.]

Let us pause before we add to this class, and add to it we surely will if we place beyond the reach of the humble that which insures equal opportunity and advantage—American citizenship. They come here in great numbers 'tis true, but each one contributes an economic value that sooner or later inures to the benefit of the country. Their fellow-countrymen came before them and aided materially in the upbuilding of the nation. They come with the same intention and should be welcomed not only to land, but in due time allowed to embrace citizenship under reasonable conditions. What would have been the effect upon the country if, sixty years ago when the great stream of immigration from Ireland and Germany were directed here, an unwise Congress had harkened to the hysterical appeals of that narrow element that then insisted that our doors be closed upon the newcomers? Having landed, suppose the right of citizenship had been denied these strangers who had come in the prime of sturdy manhood to mingle and become a part of the people of this land, do you think they would have proven such a valuable acquisition to the nation as they unquestionably have? Is it likely that they would have contributed so liberally to the prosperity of the country? Would they have rallied in such numbers and with such patriotism and valor to the cause of the Union in the gloomy days of its adversity, when the nation's life was in jeopardy, had they been forbidden by obnoxious laws to blend with our citizenship?

Thanks to the wisdom and foresight of the nation's guides of those early days they were admitted to our midst, and not only were they completely assimilated, but the blood of our body politic enriched and its physical and mental strength increased till it assumed the stature of a giant among the nations of the world. In spite of this, there are those—and the proponents of this measure are among them—who ignore the lesson of the past and lend willing ears to the advice of the busy few who advocate this doubtful policy that our worthy predecessors ever repudiated. Come these immigrants will, for a natural law, which is far stronger than social and economic laws, attracts them, and legislation can not be devised which will prove successful in keeping them from the land they have dreamed of reaching. Welcome them in the proper spirit, not with laws that proscribe. There is ample room and abundant work to be done. Let those who are endowed with the physical capacity to work and evince the proper spirit come in and share the blessings the Almighty has so generously showered upon our land. Let them share alike our adversity and prosperity, not as aliens, but full-fledged citizens in entire sympathy with our history and institutions and with an abiding interest in the nation's advancement along every line of progress. [Loud applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee whether he does not think this is a good time for the committee to rise.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16593, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PLACE ON CALL OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries be placed on the list of committees that are passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries be placed on the list of committees passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ACCOUNTS OF UNITED STATES POSTAL AGENT AT SHANGHAI, CHINA.

By unanimous consent, change of reference was made of House resolution 393 from the Committee on Foreign Affairs to the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department.

THOMAS J. LINDSEY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 11129) granting an increase of pension to Thomas J. Lindsey, with a Senate amendment; which was read.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES D. HUDSON.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 11536) granting an increase of pension to James D. Hudson, with a Senate amendment; which was read.

Mr. DIXON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT AND CIRCUIT COURTS AT EVANSTON, WYO.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 535) to amend and reenact section 1 of chapter 77 of volume 27 of the United States Statutes at Large, being "An act to provide for a term of the United States circuit and district courts at Evanston, Wyo.," approved May 23, 1892.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of chapter 77 of voluume 27 of the United States Statutes at Large, being "An act to provide for a term of the United States circuit and district courts at Evanston, Wyo.," approved May 23, 1892, be, and the same is hereby, amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"That hereafter and until otherwise provided by law there shall be held annually, on the second Tuesday in July each year, a term of the circuit and district courts for the district of Wyoming at the town of Evanston, in said district, said term to be in addition to the terms now required by law to be held at the city of Cheyenne, in said district."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MONDELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JOHNSON COUNTY, WYO.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16521) directing the Secretary of the Interior to convey a certain parcel of land to Johnson County, Wyo.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to convey and sell to the county of Johnson, in the State of Wyoming, for a poor farm, the following-described tract of land, to wit: The northeast quarter of the northwest quarter and the north half of the northeast quarter of section 8, and the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 9, in township 50 north of range 82 west, upon the payment by said county of the sum of $1.25 per acre for the said lands.

With the following amendments:

In line 4, page 1, strike out the words "and sell;" and in the same line and page, immediately preceding the word "convey," insert the words "sell and."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MONDELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell and convey a certain parcel of land to Johnson County, Wyo."

SHILOH NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16125) granting to the Corinth and Shiloh Electric Railway Company a right of way and authority to construct a track or tracks through the Shiloh National Park, and to operate electric cars thereon.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, at his discretion, and upon the favorable recommendation of the Shiloh National Park Commission, to grant a right of way to the Corinth and Shiloh Electric Railway Company and authority to lay a track or tracks through the Shiloh National Park, and to grant such other concessions as may be necessary to permit the said Corinth and Shiloh Electric Railway Company to lay said track or tracks and operate electric cars through said park: Provided, That such grant or grants shall only become or be operative on the condition that the track or tracks and roadbed of the said Corinth and Shiloh Railway Company, and the right of way for any and all extensions of the road of the said company to and through the said national park, shall first be definitely fixed and located upon a line or lines which shall be satisfactory to and approved by the said Shiloh National Park Commission, and no part of said line or lines of road, after being so located, established, built, or constructed, shall be changed, moved, or extended without the consent in writing of said Commission thereto being first had and obtained, and upon the further condition that an agreement satisfactory to the said Commission and approved by it shall be entered into on the part of the said railway company for the proper maintenance of said track or tracks and its roadbed, and to keep same at all times in proper repair and condition.

With the following amendments:

Strike out the following on page 1, lines 5 to 10: "grant a right of way to the Corinth and Shiloh Electric Railway Company and authority to lay a track or tracks through the Shiloh National Park, and to grant such other concessions as may be necessary to permit the said Corinth and Shiloh Electric Railway Company to lay said track or tracks" and insert in lieu thereof "permit and license the Corinth and Shiloh Electric Railway Company to lay a track or tracks through the Shiloh National Park."

In the proviso, page 1, line 11, strike out the words "grant or grants" and insert "license and permit."

On page 2, line 5, after "approved by the said Shiloh National Park Commission and," insert "the Secretary of War in writing, and."

Page 2, at end of line 8, after "of said commission," insert "and said Secretary."

In line 11, after "approved by it," insert "and said Secretary of War."

At the end insert "and said license and permit, and all rights of said company thereunder, shall be terminable by the Secretary of War, in whole or in part, at any time without compensation."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANDLER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, the title of the bill was amended by striking out the word "granting" and inserting the words "authorizing a license and permit."

BLACK HILLS FOREST RESERVE.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17756) to provide for the entry of agricultural lands within the Black Hills Forest Reserve.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, and he is hereby authorized, upon application or otherwise, to examine and ascertain as to the location and extent of lands within the Black Hills Forest Reserve which are chiefly valuable for agriculture, and which, in his opinion, may be occupied for agricultural purposes without injury to the said forest reserve, and which are not needed for public purposes, and may list and describe the same by metes and bounds, or otherwise, and file the lists and descriptions with the Secretary of the Interior, with the request that the said lands be opened to entry in accordance with the provisions of the homestead laws and this act.

Upon the filing of any such list or description the Secretary of the Interior shall declare the said lands open to homestead settlement and entry in tracts not exceeding 160 acres in area and not exceeding 1 mile in length, at the expiration of sixty days from the filing of the list in the land office of the district within which the lands are located, during which period the said list or description shall be prominently posted in the land office and advertised for a period of not less than four weeks in one newspaper of general circulation published in the county in which the lands are situated: Provided, That any settler actually occupying and in good faith claiming such lands for agricultural purposes prior to January 1, 1906, and who shall not have abandoned the same, and the person, if qualified to make a homestead entry, upon whose application the land proposed to be entered was examined and listed, shall, each in the order named, have a preference right of settlement and entry: Provided further, That any entryman desiring to obtain patent to any lands described by metes and bounds entered by him under the provisions of this act shall, within five years of the date of making settlement, file, with the required proof of residence and cultivation, a plat and field notes of the lands entered, made by or under the direction of the United States surveyor-general, showing accurately the boundaries of such lands, which shall be distinctly marked by monuments on the ground, and by posting a copy of such plat, together with a notice of the time and place of offering proof, in a conspicuous place on the land embraced in such plat during the period prescribed by law for the publication of his notice of intention to offer proof, and that a copy of such plat and field notes shall also be kept posted in the office of the register of the land office for the land district in which such lands are situated for a like period; and further, that any agricultural lands within said forest reserve may, at the discretion of the Secretary, be surveyed by metes and bounds, and that no lands entered under the provisions of this act shall be patented under the commutation provisions of the homestead laws, but settlers, upon final proof, shall have credit for the period of their actual residence upon the lands covered by their entries: Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture may set aside such forest-reserve lands as were not occupied by a bona fide settler January 1, 1906, when he considers them necessary for forest-reserve administrative purposes, which lands so set aside shall be listed in the local land office and shall not be subject to settlement entry or location under the public-land laws during the life of the said forest reserve, or until such lists are revoked by the Secretary.

SEC. 2. That settlers upon lands chiefly valuable for agriculture within said forest reserve on January 1, 1906, who have already exercised or lost their homestead privilege, but are otherwise competent to enter lands under the homestead laws, are hereby granted an additional homestead right of entry for the purposes of this act only, and such settlers must otherwise comply with the provisions of the homestead law, and in addition thereto must pay $2.50 per acre for lands entered under the provisions of this section, such payment to be made at the time of making final proof on such lands.

SEC. 3. That all entries under this act shall be subject to the quartz or lode mining laws of the United States and the laws and regulations permitting the location, appropriation, and use of the waters within the forest reserves for mining, irrigation, and other purposes; and no titles acquired to agricultural lands under this act shall vest in the patentee any riparian rights to any stream or streams of flowing water within said reserve; and that such limitation of title shall be expressed in the patents for the lands covered by such entries.

SEC. 4. That no homestead settlements or entries shall be allowed in that portion of the Black Hills Forest Reserve in Lawrence and Pennington counties in South Dakota except to persons occupying lands therein prior to January 1, 1906, and the provisions of this act shall apply to the said counties in said reserve only so far as is necessary to give and perfect title of such settlers or occupants to lands chiefly valuable for agriculture therein occupied or claimed by them prior to the said date, and all homestead entries under this act in said counties in said reserve shall be described by metes and bounds survey.

SEC. 5. That nothing herein contained shall be held to authorize any future settlement on any lands within said forest reserve until such lands have been opened to settlement as provided in this act, or to in any way impair the legal rights of any bona fide homestead settler who has or shall establish residence upon public lands prior to their inclusion within said forest reserve.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I understand this, it applies only to the Black Hills Forest Reserve.

Mr. LACEY. That is correct. There are two bills on the Calendar, one a general bill, and the other this special bill limited to the Black Hills Forest Reserve. The general bill produced some discussion in the committee, and as there was no opposition to the present bill it is proposed to pass this one, limited to this one forest reserve. The general bill, however, is on the Calendar, so that if it is desired to have it passed it can be done.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It seems to me we ought to have some general legislation, as there is a demand for it. The committee, I understood, were considering it.

Mr. LACEY. We have considered it and reported it, but there being no opposition to this bill, and there being some question about the other bill, the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] was quite anxious to secure the enactment of this particular bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to see some general legislation along this line.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON LABOR.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Labor be authorized to have printed and bound whatever papers and documents in connection with the subjects under consideration by the committee may be necessary for the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, April 9, at 12 o'clock meridian.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, with a copy of a letter from the governor of Alaska, papers relating to the claim of Dr. S. I. Stone and Miss Lulu Burt—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Tyaskin Creek, Maryland—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed, with accompanying illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. LITTLEFIELD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House H. R. 17572, reported in lieu thereof a bill (H. R. 17880) making penal certain acts when committed within the territorial and maritime jurisdiction of the United States and prescribing the punishment therefor, accompanied by a report (No. 3013); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. PARKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 17501) to amend section 169 of the Revised Statutes of 1878, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 3015); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MONDELL, from the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 17883) providing for the administration of the operations of the act of Congress approved June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 3019); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15961) to quiet title to certain lots in the District of Columbia, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 3020); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

SURVEY IN PENOBSCOT BAY, MAINE.

Mr. FRYE. I report back from the Committee on Commerce favorably a concurrent resolution providing for a survey, and my colleague [Mr. HALE] would like to have it considered now.

The concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. HALE on the 6th instant was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be made an examination and survey of Long Cove, the approach thereto, Cape Jellison Harbor and the waters leading thereto, between Cape Jellison and Sears Island, Penobscot Bay, Maine.

UNIVERSITY OF UTAH.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5498) granting additional lands adjacent to its site to the University of Utah, to report it favorably with an amendment, and I submit a report thereon.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The bill just reported by the Senator from Wyoming has the approval of the War Department and is of importance to my State. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will go over.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the bill will not be detained. The bill has been read and the amendment reported by the committee was just about being read.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I understood from the reading that the amendment had not been incorporated in the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment reported by the committee will be read.

The SECRETARY. The committee report to add, after the word "land" at the end of the bill, the words "at the expense of the University of Utah."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting additional lands from the Fort Douglas Military Reservation to the University of Utah."

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5153) granting additional lands adjacent to its site to the University of Utah, to report it adversely, and I move its indefinite postponement.

The motion was agreed to.

COURTS IN TENNESSEE.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 20) to change and fix the time for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the middle district of Tennessee; in the southern division of the eastern district of Tennessee at Chattanooga, and the northeastern division of the eastern district of Tennessee at Greeneville, and for other purposes, to report it favorably, without amendment.

Mr. FRAZIER. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PILES introduced a bill (S. 5606) to provide for the erection of a public building at the city of Juneau, in the district of Alaska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CULLOM (for Mr. HOPKINS) submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,000 for a librarian of the United States circuit court of appeals for the seventh judicial circuit, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KITTREDGE submitted an amendment authorizing the issuance of a fee simple patent to Jennie Quinn, Sisseton and Wahpeton allottee, for land heretofore allotted to her, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. McLAURIN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

POST-OFFICE SUPPLIES AND MAIL MATTER.

Mr. CLAY. I submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate—

First. The aggregate of all the mail carried, in pounds, for the year ending June 30, 1900.

Second. The aggregate of all the mail carried, in pounds, for the year ending June 30, 1905.

Third. What per cent was first class, second class free matter, third and fourth class together, Government free matter, equipment for the Post-Office Department and other Departments?

Fourth. The Postmaster-General is also directed to inform the Senate of the practice of the various Departments of the Government in transmitting by mail merchandise in connection with the administration of the Departments. For example, would a canceling machine for use in a local post-office be properly mailable matter, to be carried without question by the Department?

Has there been any ruling by your Department to the effect that post-office supplies of whatever nature, regardless of weight, are not prohibited admission to the mails, and does this same ruling apply to supplies for any other Executive Department, regardless of the 4 pounds' limit? In other words, is it not true that the weight limit does not prevail against the Post-Office Department or other Executive Departments transmitting matter through the mail?

The Postmaster-General is also directed to inform the Senate what class of articles weighing more than 4 pounds are usually transmitted through the mails free by the Post-Office Department and Executive Departments.

Is it not true that the other Executive Departments use the mails for the purpose of transmitting supplies of almost every class free of charges, and does not the use of the mails for the transmission of such articles tend to increase the weight, which weight becomes the basis of pay to the railroads, and is it not true that the weight of the mails would be greatly decreased if the Post-Office Department and other Executive Departments were required to carry by freight all articles of supply and equipment above 4 pounds' limit instead of by mail? Is it not true that such a provision of law would greatly decrease the cost of carrying the mails and would not interfere with the efficiency of the service?

If all articles of equipment for the Post-Office Department and other Departments above the 4 pounds' limit were excluded from the mails, about what per cent would this decrease the total weight of the mails, and how much cheaper could such articles be carried by freight than by mail?

The Postmaster-General is also directed to inform the Senate whether or not, in his opinion, a provision of law requiring that all post-office supplies and supplies for all other Executive Departments of the Government above the 4 pounds' limit be carried by freight instead of by mail would in any way impair the efficiency of the post-office service.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think the resolution ought to go over, so that Senators may have an opportunity to look at it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the resolution will be printed and go over.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 16125. An act authorizing a license and permit to the Corinth and Shiloh Electric Railway Company to construct a track or tracks through the Shiloh National Park, and to operate electric cars thereon, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

H. R. 16226. An act to amend the internal-revenue laws and to prevent the double taxation of certain distilled spirits was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

H. R. 16521. An act directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell and convey a certain parcel of land to Johnson County, Wyo., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

H. R. 17756. An act to provide for the entry of agricultural lands within the Black Hills Forest Reserve was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

FANNIE DINER.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 132) permitting the waiving of the alien immigration law in the case of Fannie Diner was read the first time by its title.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I ask to have the joint resolution read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he hereby is, authorized to waive the provisions of "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States," approved March 3, 1903, in the case of Fannie Diner, if, after investigation, he deem such waiver proper.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, my attention has been called to this joint resolution by the Department of Commerce and Labor, or rather by the Bureau of Immigration, a part of that Department. It appears that the person named in the joint resolution is an idiot and comes clearly within the provisions of the law, and has been ordered to be deported at the expense of the company which brought her here.

The case briefly stated is as follows: The family consists of a mother, one son, and four daughters. The son and three daughters are already in this country. The son is a prosperous business man. The mother and the idiot daugher have just arrived and have been ordered to be deported. The son is very anxious to make some provision for the idiot sister, but there is no provision of the law under which any guaranty can be given. I understand the immigration officers have said to him if he would provide a suitable person to accompany the idiot sister upon her return to the country from which she came the mother will be admitted. I do not know that under the law anything further can be done, and I do not know why anything further should be asked for. If the immigration laws mean anything they mean that this person should be denied admittance to the United States. The joint resolution is an attempt, of course, to override the general law and to admit this person into the United States.

I do not know that I can say anything further in explanation of the joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Immigration.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On April 5:

S. 1345. An act to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States.

On April 6:

S. 4825. An act to provide for the construction of a bridge across Rainy River, in the State of Minnesota.

On April 9:

S. 2872. An act for the relief of the French Trans-Atlantic Cable Company;

S. 3899. An act granting authority to the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to dismiss midshipmen from the United States Naval Academy and regulating the procedure and punishment in trials for hazing at the said academy;

S. 4111. An act to authorize the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, to receive four 3.6-inch breech-loading field guns, carriages, caissons, limbers, and their pertaining equipment from the State of Connecticut;

S. 4300. An act to amend section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, inspectors of hulls and boilers of steam vessels;

S. 5181. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Snake River between Whitman and Columbia counties, in the State of Washington;

S. 5182. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River between Franklin and Benton counties, in the State of Washington; and

S. 5183. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River between Douglas and Kittitas counties, in the State of Washington.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17359) making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. TELLER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

STATISTICS RELATING TO COAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate providing for the printing of certain papers and documents of the Navy Department relating to the efficiency of various coals used by the United States vessels for steaming purposes, which was, on page 2, to strike out all after line 1 down to and including line 5 and insert "2,000 copies shall be printed, 500 copies for the Senate, 1,000 copies for the House of Representatives, and 500 copies for the Navy Department."

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

SPANISH TREATY CLAIMS COMMISSION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

There is herewith transmitted for the information of the Congress a communication from the president of the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission relative to the progress and condition of the business of that Commission. From this report it is clearly apparent that the work of the Commission is proceeding with due care and reasonable expedition. The Spanish Government is now courteously furnishing the evidence from its archives and officials which is indispensable to give complete information concerning the transactions upon which the claims before the Commission are founded.

I recommend the passage of a law limiting and fixing the fees of attorneys in cases where awards are made in favor of claimants; and also that the question whether a right of review by the Supreme Court of the decisions of the Commission should be given by means of writs of certiorari be decided at the present session of Congress.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 9, 1906.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The message and accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and be printed.

Mr. LODGE. I think the Chair will find that all matters relating to the Spanish treaty have heretofore been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The message and accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, in the absence of objection.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. McLAURIN. I ask that House bill 12987 be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, the consideration of this bill seems to be somewhat embarrassed by two things. One thing is, some of the newspapers ever and anon tell us what the President's wishes are in respect to the passage of this or some other bill. At one time these media of the dissemination of current news tell us that the President has had a conference with certain Members of Congress—Senators or Representatives, or both—in which he has set forth more specifically than in his message to Congress his views concerning this measure, and urged their adoption by these Members of Congress and enactment by Congress into law. Shortly afterwards we are told by these papers that the President has modified his views in some particulars and advanced additional views in other particulars, labeled with his private mark and given to a chosen few. Shortly again we are told that all of this is untrue, and that the President, having constitutionally discharged his official duty in the matter when he sent his message to Congress, is content to rest upon that message.

Now, I am loath to believe that the President is playing lobbyist and is, by urging upon a few Members of Congress private views and policies into whose confidence he does not take the entire Congress, attempting to vote the confidential few as proxies. I would rather believe that the President, having well considered this Democratic policy and doctrine of the right of Congress to so regulate interstate commerce as to give a fair return to capital invested in the business, and prohibit extortion by the carrier upon the shipper, advocated all over the country by Democrats, led by that Christian gentleman as well as great statesman and orator, William Jennings Bryan, more than a decade ago, is trying to induce his party to forego their opposition and support the policy even if they do not teach the doctrine.

The other thing that seems to embarrass this consideration is the question that appears to be in the minds of some Senators, How far will the courts permit Congress to legislate in this direction? I will give attention to this embarrassment farther along in this discussion.

I am not one of those, if there be such, who believe there should be, or is, a constant warfare between the people and the carriers, as if the carriers themselves were not a part of the people. Nor do I believe that the enactment of laws defining limits higher than which carriers shall not go in the collection of tolls for carriage implies a distrust of the whole body of carriers any more than I believe that the enactment of laws for the punishment of faithless officials implies a reflection upon the integrity of officeholders generally.

I believe the law should regulate the transportation of property wholly by water, as well as wholly by railroad, but inasmuch as the bill in its present shape—and I fear in the shape in which it will appear when the Senate shall have done amending it—omits transportation wholly by water and thereby practically confines it to railroad regulation, I will briefly refer to it from this aspect.

When capitalists design to construct a railroad they decide to voluntarily appropriate their private property, sufficient to construct the railroad, to public use, and in the construction of the railroad do voluntarily appropriate such private property to public use. To do this they induce the creating of a corporation, and procure a charter therefor, that they may not be liable individually for more than they are willing voluntarily to appropriate to public use. The corporation thus becomes an artificial person, is not now exclusively a private affair, but has engaged in a public emprise. It asks and is allowed to and does exercise the power of eminent domain, an attribute of sovereignty; so that if the owner of land through which it is designed to run the railroad is unwilling to make a contract for the sale of a right of way for the railroad over his land, or, being willing to sell the right of way, will not or does not agree with the corporation upon the price, this company invokes and obtains the authority and power of the Government to compel him, in one instance to sell and in the other instance to agree upon a price for the right of way over his land. This is done under that authority which empowers the Government to take private property for public use, limited only by the inhibition that just compensation shall first be made, and there is no other warrant for its expropriation in this manner. Land is taken in the same way, with or without the owner's consent, for depots, stations, offices, ballast—in the way of gravel pits—and all other purposes necessary or useful for the convenience of the company.

It follows that when the railroad is constructed it is appropriated to public use. It is public property of private ownership and operated by private persons for private compensation. The right to condemn and take, upon just compensation, the private property of others being exercised by the railroad company expressly for public use, it were the height of absurdity were the company to assert immunity from legislative regulation under the claim that it is private property, in the ordinary sense of the words "private property." If the legislative authority were helpless to reach it except as it reaches other private property, as soon as it is condemned and compulsorily acquired for public use the company could withdraw it from that or any other public use. The contemplation of such a result is not to be tolerated. Ordinarily when private property is taken for public use it is done by the State for the State and the just compensation is paid by the State, and the State therefore exclusively uses the property for the entire public—I use the word "State" here in the sense of either the State or General Government. But when a railroad company is permitted to exercise the power of eminent domain, and thereby takes private property for public use, the just compensation is paid by the company. There is then an implied, if not an express, understanding that while the property shall be used for the public the company shall be permitted to collect a reasonable return for its use in the way of tolls from those of the public to whom it renders service.

By this law-invoked arrangement the railroad company has a right to demand and collect a reasonable toll for reasonable services, and its patrons have a right to demand and receive reasonable services for a reasonable toll. Neither ought to desire more or less than this. The arrangement involves reciprocal rights, duties, and obligations.

The company's property being voluntarily appropriated to public use for private compensation and kept in operation and repair by contributions from shippers in return for services rendered, it follows that the property of the shipper is appropriated to public use as well as that of the company.

The property having lost its character as private property and acquired a new character as public property by an arrangement between the company and the Government voluntarily contracted by both, under such circumstances that of necessity its repair and operation must be done by contributions from its patrons, whatever such contributions may be they go to a public use. For the company can not refuse to take of these contributions and repair and operate its property for the public.

After providing the money for repair and operation of this public property the patrons must contribute a further amount sufficient to compensate the company for construction and management and supervision. This is a just arrangement, and it is one of which the patrons do not complain. The fact that the property is owned and managed and controlled by the company does not make it any the less property devoted to public use; nor does it depreciate the fact that money levied to repair and operate it is devoted to public use.

If the property is devoted to public use money levied to improve and operate it for public use is necessarily devoted to public use. It follows "as the night follows the day."

Chief Justice Waite, in 99 United States, 719, said:

> It is a private corporation created for public purposes, and its property is to a large extent devoted to public uses.

Neither the railroad company nor the patron has the exclusive right to fix what is reasonable compensation for services demanded and given. If either has the exclusive right to fix rates Congress has no right to regulate the compensation. The patrons of the railroads—the shippers and passengers—have never, so far as I have ever heard, essayed to do so. The railroad companies, by reason of their position in the transaction, have generally fixed the amount of this compensation, and, for the same reason, the patrons have generally acquiesced. But this has neither forfeited the right of one nor absolved the duty of the other. If the company is required to do the service for less than reasonable tolls, to that extent its property is taken for public use without just compensation; if the patron of the railroad is required to pay more than what is reasonable for the services he receives from the railroad company, to that extent his property is taken for public use without just compensation. It is partiality—of which no government or law should be guilty—to deprecate the taking of the property of railroad companies for public use without just compensation and ignore the taking of the private property of the humble citizen for public use without equally just compensation.

It is not always easy—I may say it is, as a rule, difficult—for the impartial critic to say what is reasonable compensation for given services by the railroad company. It is far more difficult for the shipper or carrier, impressed with his or its partiality for his or its own interest, to define the limits of reasonableness or unreasonableness in the assessment of rates. Therefore it is that an impartial commission may be legally established to adjust such differences as may arise between carriers and shippers as to rates, rebates, discriminations, and preferences whenever such differences shall arise. The establishment of such a commission pertains to the lawmaking department of the Government. The Supreme Court of the United States holds that Congress has such power. I refer to the case of Commission v. Railroad Company (167 U. S.), and could refer to others, and would do so but for the fact that I have not so far found a case holding a different opinion.

The Interstate Commerce Commission can meet the exigencies of the case in many instances; there are thousands of cases and conditions which it is impossible for the Commission to reach. I speak of intermediate points and small shippers. Large cities and large and wealthy shippers can take their cases and grievances before the Commission, and are able, through the Commission, or even without the Commission, to take care of themselves. But small shippers and shippers from intermediate points, either from the country or from small towns, are unable to take their cases before the Commission; and if they could get them there, the time required by the Commission to hear all of them would involve interminable delay.

Must these people be ignored? Shall they receive no consideration in this matter? Shall their patriotism be requited with a sneer when they ask that the little modicum of property acquired by their brains, business energy, and brawny arms shall receive at the hands of the Government the same treatment given to the wealth of the rich and great? They are patient in many instances, to be sure, because their circumstances compel them to be so, but even-handed justice to them by the law is the best foundation for the security and perpetuity of the Government.

I have offered an amendment to the bill which, if adopted, will be self-operating and will go far toward doing justice to this part of the people. It proposes that the carrier shall not charge more for carrying freight a part of the distance than for carrying the same freight the whole distance in the same direction between two given points. It does not propose the mileage basis for freight transportation. To illustrate, it proposes if certain freight is shipped from Chicago, by Pittsburg, to New York for a dollar the same carrier shall not collect more than a dollar for shipping the same freight from Chicago to Pittsburg.

I will further illustrate by existing, or formerly existing conditions, if my information is correct. Port Gibson is between Vicksburg and New Orleans, on the Yazoo and Mississippi Valley Railroad. Cotton was—and is now, I understand—shipped over this road from Vicksburg, by Port Gibson, to New Orleans for a half dollar a bale; but from Port Gibson to New Orleans the rate is, or was, if I am correctly informed, one dollar and six bits a bale, three and a half times as much. In this instance, if 50 cents from Vicksburg is a fair rate, more than 50 cents from Port Gibson is extortion, and neither logic nor sophistry can refute the assertion. The same state of affairs, in more or less degree, applies to all the other towns between Vicksburg and New Orleans, and to the towns above Vicksburg, except where they touch or virtually touch the river.

Now, that it is neither right nor honest to require one man to pay the tariff or freight for another all men are agreed. That equality is equity no man will deny. And here let me, parenthetically, say to all others who favor the jurisdiction of courts of equity to adjudge whether the rate ordained is or not violative of the Constitution that those who demand equity should do equity. Do equity by giving equality to the country shipper and small-town shipper and small shipper. If it is a fair price to carry certain freight from the east by Laurel, Ellisville, Hattiesburg, or any other town on the way, to New Orleans for a dollar, it is extortion to charge these towns more than a dollar when it is stopped there on its way.

If the toll charged to the terminal point is not sufficient to make just compensation and the balance is collected from shippers on the way, such collection is the taking of one's property and discharging the obligation of another with it. Somebody must make just compensation to the carrier, and if the shipper to the terminal is not required to make it, the intermediate shipper has to make it, in addition to paying for the services he himself receives. I fear I should be said to be unparliamentary if I were to characterize such a transaction, but I may be allowed to say that if an individual were, at the point of a pistol, to take the property of one and apply it to the discharge of the obligation of another, he should "be in danger of the judgment."

But they say such an amendment as this, while it is just, would necessitate a revision of railroad rates all over the country. Is not this bill for a revision of the rates of the entire country? If rates are not wrong, they should not be disturbed; if they are wrong, all the wrong should be remedied. While this is being done I desire to see this relief given to people who can, better than in any other way, get relief through self-operating law. I would allow the shipper whose rights are invaded or denied to go into the courts at home and with the least expense be indemnified.

The amendment of the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] to forbid corporations to contribute to campaign funds is so eminently just that, while I have not the time to discuss or mention more than two or three amendments, I must say it should undoubtedly meet with no opposition.

I heartily indorse the amendment of the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] to prohibit the issuance of free passes. The officers of the railroad companies, however, who have private cars have them fitted up for offices where they can work while they travel, and I see no reason why the different companies should not be allowed to exchange the courtesy of carrying each others cars as heretofore.

I come now to discuss the amendment of the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. This involves the constitutionality of a provision prohibiting the issuance of preliminary injunctions on ex parte hearings, and also the powers of Congress to pass a law to prevent a decree before a full and final hearing.

It is contended by the opponents of that part of the amendment that denies to the courts jurisdiction to set aside the Commission's order until a final hearing that Congress can not repeal or change any part of the common law of equity. In support of this contention we are cited to the first section of the third article of the Constitution, which reads:

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish, etc.

The next section reads:

> The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made or which shall be made under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign states, citizens, or subjects.

It may be that the opinion I entertain in reference to these two sections exists because of the opacity of my mind, that will not let in the light necessary to see the refinements of the distinguished Senators who have argued this contention. But I am unable to see that the framers of the Constitution were at all obscure in dedicating this judicial power. They had said that "all legislative power herein granted shall be vested in a Congress;" that the executive power shall be vested in a President, and now say where the judicial power shall be vested. The time when these powers shall be vested in Congress, a President, and the courts is not designated, but it is expressly in the future, and manifestly when and as soon as the Government shall be in operation under this Constitution.

The Constitution is an instrument of enumeration and not of definition. It was putting in operation a government of three coordinate departments, each the equal of either of the others, and not only supreme, but exclusive, within its own sphere—the legislative to make the laws, the executive to administer, and the judicial to adjudicate causes according to the laws. I take issue with the distinguished and learned Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] when he says the judicial department was created to hold the other two departments to the limitations of the Constitution. The Senator himself says the three are coordinate and independent. This were impossible if one had power over the others. Besides, instances can be cited where the Executive has encroached upon the limitations of the Constitution and the courts had no power to reach him or his encroachment.

After vesting in Congress all legislative powers that are granted, and in a President the executive power, and the courts the judicial power of the United States all the powers of this Government were vested. The intention of the framers of the Constitution was to say that the power of each department shall be distinct and exclusive. It follows, then, mathematically that none of the departments can constitutionally exercise any power that pertains to the jurisdiction of either of the others.

For instance, Congress can not try causes involving the rights of litigants, nor enter decrees, nor set aside verdicts, but it can, and it is its duty to, enact laws by which the trial of such causes shall be conducted, decrees entered, and verdicts set aside. Courts can not make laws prescribing what is right and prohibiting what is wrong, but they can, and it is their duty to, try the causes of litigants, adjudge the causes, decree what is right, and enjoin what is wrong, according to such laws enacted by Congress.

One of the earliest things I learned in law is that a court is a place where justice is administered according to law. This is the judicial power of the United States, to administer justice according to the laws of Congress and the Constitution. The laws of Congress are no less obligatory upon the courts than the laws of the Constitution. Where acts of Congress conflict with the Constitution they are not laws; but where there is no such conflict the acts of Congress are as binding upon the courts as any mandate or prohibition or vestment of the Constitution.

Judicial has been defined to mean "of or belonging to a court of justice; of or pertaining to a judge; pertaining to the administration of justice; proper to a court of law; consisting of or resulting from legal inquiry or judgment, as judicial power or proceedings; a judicial decision, writ, sale, or punishments; determinative; giving judgment." When the word "judicial," limiting the word "power," was used in the Constitution it was to distinguish this power from the legislative power granted to Congress and from the executive power granted to the President. It meant to say that the courts must be confined to adjudications according to law, and not to make law nor exercise functions pertaining to the executive.

As said by Justice Field (99 U. S., 761):

> The distinction between a judicial and legislative act is well defined. The one determines what the law is, and what the rights of the parties are with reference to transactions already had; the other prescribes what the law shall be in future cases arising under it.

In 10 Wheaton, Wayman v. Southard, it was held that the legislative department establishes rules; the judicial department determines rights and obligations by such rules.

If the Constitution had declared the law by which the courts are to be governed, that alone would be the law to govern courts in adjudicating causes and entering judgments and decrees; and Congress could have no authority to enact laws to the contrary or even supplementary; but as the Constitution did not, even by the most farfetched construction, do this, but after vesting Congress with power to declare the laws for the guidance of courts as well as of the people empowered the courts to adjudicate, it is clear that the intention was that the power of adjudication should be in accordance with Congressional enactment, if such enactment be authorized by the Constitution.

In New York, in 1777, just shortly after the Declaration of Independence, and while the Revolutionary war was in progress, in the adoption of a Constitution the thirty-fifth article declared that—

Such parts of the common law of England and of the statute law of England and Great Britain and the acts of the legislature of the colony of New York as together did form the law of the said colony on the 19th April, 1775, shall be and continue the law of this State, subject to such alterations and provisions as the legislature of the State shall from time to time make concerning the same.

Under that Constitution the judicial power had a chart at once for its guidance in judicial exercise. It was evidently thought necessary by the framers of that Constitution that a provision of the kind should be ingrafted.

They also evidently thought the term "judicial power" did not carry with it any power independent of law.

It is said the courts are by the Constitution vested with power. This is true; but it is not arbitrary power. It is neither unlimited nor unqualified power. It is judicial; there it is qualified power. It is the judicial power of the United States, but not the judicial power of the individual States; here it is limited.

The power that draws the vehicle is vested in the horse; but it is not an unbridled power. The power that propels the engine is vested in the steam; but it is not an unrestrained power; it is guided by fixed mechanical laws. The beneficence of the power in each instance is in the law that governs.

So the beneficence of the power vested by the Constitution in the courts is in the restriction of it to judicial exercise—that is, to adjudging according to law. The law protects the unborn babe; protects the infant in the cradle, the schoolboy, the young man strong in the vigor of his youth, the middle-aged ripe in thought, and the old man with whitened locks and trembling steps supported by his staff, and when at last he totters into the beckoning grave it protects the little mound of earth that marks his final resting place this side of eternity. Courts are neither authorized nor empowered to make or enact this law; Congress is empowered to enact it and courts are constitutionally commanded to obey it.

Eulogiums upon the blessings and beneficence and benefactions of courts will hear no dissonant voice from me, but it is always with the understanding that they are governed by law. Thus guided and governed all are safe under their influence and protecting power, but turned loose without restraint or limitation they are like some magnificent ocean steamer plowing the trackless deep, without chart or compass, rudder or pilot, fraught with no special cargo and destined to no definite port.

As I understand Senators, it is contended that courts have certain inherent powers that can not be controlled by law, and that one of these is the power of courts of equity to grant preliminary injunctions. It is true that courts of equity are established by law; it is true that courts of equity follow the law, and this not in the sense of sequence but in the sense of having common-law rules for their guidance the same as common-law courts; it is true that their power to issue writs of injunction is derived from law just as the authority of common-law courts is derived, either from immemorial custom, which constitutes common law, or statutory enactment; it is true that the legislative power to repeal or amend the common law has never been denied by any court; but in the face of all this the contention is that there is an inherent power in courts of equity to grant preliminary injunctions that defies all the powers of Congress.

In a case in Texas—Messner v. Giddings (65 Texas)—when it was claimed that the court had authority over the estate of minors under that clause of the Texas constitution conferring on the district courts all the powers of courts of equity, Judge Stayton, speaking for the court, said:

If it is claimed that in the court, as a court of equity, under that clause (of the constitution), the power existed, it must be replied that the district court, whether as a court of law or court of equity, had only such power as the constitution gave it. There is no such thing as the inherent power of a court, if by that he meant a power which a court may exercise without a law authorizing it. That clause of the constitution empowered district courts to exercise all the power given, whether the procedure necessary to accomplish that purpose be such as pertains to a court of law or court of equity; but it in no manner conferred upon such courts the power to exercise any and every power that at any time may have been exercised by courts of chancery in England or elsewhere.

In the case of Austin, etc., v. Cluck (97 Tex., and reported in 64 L. R. A.) the court reiterated this principle, and also said the clause of the Texas constitution conferred on the district court "all the powers of courts of equity."

All the powers of courts of law and of courts of equity being conferred by the Texas constitution on the district court, I am unable to perceive how it can be said that less judicial power is conferred thereby than is conferred by the United States Constitution.

I will digress here far enough to say that the court in these two cases treated jurisdiction and power as synonyms. I can not see how there can be power without jurisdiction or jurisdiction without power. They are used by courts interchangeably. The court can not have power without jurisdiction, nor can it use jurisdiction without power. The power of the court is coextensive with its jurisdiction, and its jurisdiction is necessarily coextensive with its power. To convert a mathematical maxim, things that are equal to each other are equal to the same thing.

In the case of Newark, etc., R. Co. v. Newark (23 N. J. Eq., 515), the court said:

In the absence of modification arising from statutory or an established course of proceeding the practice of this court is in conformity with the House of Lords. On all unsettled points this is the model to which we recur. With the exception just mentioned, the established English routine is the law of this court, and such law is as obligatory, until altered by statute, as are any of the general principles of the common law.

The constitution of Mississippi (1832) is in effect the same as that of the United States in reference to this subject. It reads (sec. 1, art. 4):

The judicial power of this State shall be vested in one high court of errors and appeals and such other courts of law and equity as are hereinafter provided in this constitution.

In the case of McGowan v. James (12 Smedes and Marshall, 448), arising under that constitution and laws thereunder, Judge Clayton, speaking for the court, said:

The statute directs that in default of an answer the bill may be taken pro confesso and set for hearing at the same term; and such pro confesso, so taken, shall not be set aside unless upon good cause shown and payment of costs. This strongly implies that it shall be done upon good cause shown, and we can scarcely conceive a stronger showing than was here made.

This decision recognized the power of the legislature to make laws for the government of the courts of equity in future cases in a matter that goes to the very equity of the case.

That was when William L. Sharkey was chief justice, than whom no greater jurist ever sat in this or any other country.

In the case of Pittman v. McClellan (55 Miss.) the court said:

To what extent has the statute changed the practice? First, it has converted what was before very much a matter of discretion into a matter of duty.

This was under the constitution of 1869, which, in this respect, was in effect as the one I have read.

In a case in 5 California (pages 74 and 75) it was held that the legislature did not have power to enact a law prohibiting the court from granting an injunction in a specified case, but the implication is clear in that case that the legislature had the power to make such a rule—the manifestly implied holding being in substance that to make rules for all cases or for a class of cases is legislative, but to apply such rules to specified cases is judicial.

In 47 Mississippi, page 619, and 55 Mississippi, page 19, it is held that the legislature may enact laws shifting the burden of proof from the plaintiff to the defendant. This was in an equity court. That was in the case of a tax title, the act of the legislature providing that the tax deed shall prevail and constitute prima facie proof that everything was lawfully done in the sale until it is disproved on final hearing. This being so it will be analogous legislation to enact that the action of the Commission shall be prima facie proof that the rate named by the Commission will return just compensation until its assailant shall prove otherwise upon final hearing.

If courts in the exercise of judicial power were not to be unfettered by law and if Congress could not pass laws for their government or guidance, by what laws were they to adjudicate? While there is common law of the States, and many of the rights of the people rest upon this common law of the States, there is no such thing as common law of the United States. I refer for this to Bucher v. R. R. Co. (125 U. S., 583, 584), and there are other cases.

If it had been intended that the words "judicial power" should vest the courts with all power that courts had theretofore exercised, there would have been no necessity for the second clause of section 9, Article I, which prohibited the suspension of "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus." This was an old writ coming from the Roman republic through the Empire and dark ages, and if anything could have been thought to be sanctified in the jurisprudence of English-speaking peoples it is this writ. It deals with human liberty, whose aspirations never die; injunction deals with property, that perishes.

When Senators produce judicial authorities to prove that when courts have jurisdiction of a matter or case they may exercise power over it to the full limit of the Constitution, they are engaged in a work of supererogation. This principle is judicially axiomatic. The question still recurs, What is the limit of the Constitution? It is the line that divides the judicial power from the legislative power and from the executive power. It is the line that marks the boundary between the investigation of the rights of litigants, as such rights existed by the law at the time of their genesis, and the prescribing of rules of action for the future, commanding what is right and forbidding what is wrong. It is not for the court to inquire whether rules prescribed by Congress, within its constitutional sphere, will do justice or equity.

Nor is it for the court to adopt what appears to it better rules for its judgment in the dispensation of justice. Under our form of government the courts must take that which is commanded by the acts of Congress, in its constitutional sphere, as being right and that which is prohibited as being wrong, so long as such acts remain unrepealed. Congress often passes vicious acts, especially when it is Republican, but if they are within the scope of its constitutional authority the courts have no right to repeal them.

And, as said by Chief Justice Waite, in 99 United States, 718:

> Every possible presumption is in favor of the validity of the statute.

It is not necessary to resort to the court to get a confirmation of the law. It is the law when Congress, within its sphere, enacts it. (Swift v. Tyson, 16 Peters, 18.)

But I will not detain the Senate longer on this question. I fear I am trespassing upon your patience. I beg your further indulgence, however, while I devote a few moments to another phase of the question.

It being true that Congress has the power to prohibit the issuance of preliminary injunctions, the next question is the wisdom of its exercise. If the Commission should name a rate less than sufficient to return just compensation to the carrier, the difference between such rate and a sufficient rate during the time of the litigation would be taken from the carrier without just compensation if preliminary injunction is denied, and therefore the carrier's property would be taken for public use to that extent without just compensation.

But if the Commission names a rate sufficient to return just compensation to the carrier and it is less than the rate fixed by the carrier and a preliminary injunction is granted, the private property of the patrons of the carrier, to the extent of the difference between the rate named by the Commission and that fixed by the carrier, is taken for public use without just compensation to them during the time of the litigation.

So in the very nature of the case there is a possibility of the taking of some one's property for public use without just compensation. If preliminary injunction is granted and the Commission's rate is unlawful no harm is done by the injunction. If preliminary injunction is denied and the Commission's rate is lawful no harm is done by the denial.

This is a case, then, where probabilities must be weighed against each other. Two interested parties have a controversy as to rates and take it before a supposedly disinterested and impartial commission for arbitration. When the commission makes its award the probabilities should be far greater that the award is correct than the contention of either of the parties. There is, therefore, far less probability of taking private property for public use without just compensation by denying than by granting preliminary injunction.

Besides, the shipper, in the very nature of the case, can not appeal, so that if he has a just contention and the Commission by mistake rejects it, he must continue to suffer the taking of his private property for public use without just compensation, without remedy or review by the courts.

It has been proposed to compose the difficulty of doing exact justice by requiring the carrier to fund, during the litigation, the difference between the Commission and railroad rates, the carrier retaining it if successful and returning it to the shippers if unsuccessful. Instead of composing the existing difficulty, this arrangement would add another. In some instances it would do justice or equity, but, as a rule, the shipper has added the excess tariff to his customer's debit, and the customer, who really has paid it, could never receive its return.

It is not always possible for the courts to see that parties receive exact justice or equity. Delays in hearing causes are inevitable; and every day's delay is a suspension of the rights of the party whose cause is just, from which delay he may suffer irremediable and redressless loss. Innocent men are sometimes deprived of their liberty, while baseless charges against them are delayed of hearing because of the imperfections indissolubly incident to all human affairs. But these are evils that can not be avoided. They are inevitably incident to the exigencies of government.

So in the case under consideration. There is unavoidable danger of irremediable loss to some one, or more. Legislative powers and judicial efforts should be exerted to minimize this danger to the least degree.

If any carrier should be so dissatisfied with and feel so aggrieved by the award of the Commission as to desire to have a judicial investigation of the matter, no just thought would deny access to the courts and a full judicial review of every question of constitutional and legal right. Indeed, constitutional right is legal right, and legal right is constitutional right.

But as the court's power is limited to enjoining the taking of the carrier's property without just compensation, and can not adjudicate and establish what is a just compensatory rate, the shipper is thereby denied any appeal to the court, though he may be ever so dissatisfied and feel ever so aggrieved by the Commission's award. The power to fix rates being legislative, Congress can not confer it upon courts, therefore it is beyond judicial power to correct an error of the Commission against the shipper who complains of rates.

Only one of the parties to the controversy before the Commission—the carrier—having access to the courts, the Commission's order should not be enjoined until a full and final hearing—a hearing that ought to be expedited by legislative rule and judicial effort.

It is not as if Congress were prescribing rules for enjoining the pulling down of buildings or excavation of lands or killing live stock and the like, where all the damage sought to be prohibited will have been done before a hearing can be had; but it is an injunction to forbid the exercise of the order of a lawfully constituted commission in a case where it is impossible for an injunction bond to even approximately indemnify the really injured parties if the injunction shall be found without legal merit.

Before concluding I will address a few words to the political complexion of this matter. We frequently hear from Republicans and read in Republican newspapers of the nonpartisanness—if I may coin a word—of this measure. But these Republicans and Republican newspapers in discussing it speak of it as the President's policy, as if the President were the Columbus of it. We have seen all along accounts of conferences between the President and Republican Representatives and Senators in reference to this measure, but until a very few days ago, after this fact had excited remark as appearing to show that there is partisanship in it, I never heard of a Democratic Senator or Representative being consulted. And after the able and alert junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] prepared and offered an amendment to meet the justice, as well as constitutional obligation, of opening a door to the courts, and, at the same time, protecting the shipper's rights and interests by limiting the court's decree to the final hearing of the cause before decree, and prohibiting a preliminary injunction on ex parte hearing, an amendment not so explicit, but along similar lines, is introduced by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG], and we are told by these newspapers that this is an amendment prepared by the President, and that it is desirable that we, the Democrats, go over and help him to adopt it, as well as help him to carry out his policy.

If this is nonpolitical legislation, what good reason can be given for ignoring the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]? It is far more explicit and better adapted to do justice and reach the just end sought to be attained. This is not a policy discovered and copyrighted or patented by the President. It is a policy proclaimed and advocated by the Democratic party long since and opposed by the President and Republican party until less than a year and a half ago, when the President seems to have first seen its beneficence. I say opposed by the President, because his party opposed it, and I presume as soon as he saw his party's error he made the announcement, and that was not made until December, 1904.

Now, assuming that the President and the faction in his party who are willing to follow him on this measure are sincere and earnestly desire legislation herein in the interest of the great mass of plain people of the country, let him and them come over and help us enact a law that will be a sure-enough law—one that has meaning sufficient to accomplish the good results for which the entire country is looking. Let them help us to enact a rate law that will give relief to the plain people of all walks and vocations. Let us give the small farmer and the large farmer, who ships his cotton or flour or corn or meat, a fair rate, and lift the hand of extortion from him. Let us reduce any exorbitant rate on the food and fuel that feeds and warms the laboring man in cities and towns and villages, and at the same time reduce any exorbitant rate upon the large shipper.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] eulogized in this discussion what he termed the "blessings of a protective tariff." Let us remove by this bill one of the curses of a prohibitive tariff. I know of no exact rule for determining what is just compensation, within the meaning of the Constitution, for the carriage of freight or passengers by railroads; but I do know that the cost of the construction of the railroad and its equipage enters into its computation. The greater the cost of construction, the more will the railroad company be allowed to charge for its services; and the less the cost of construction, the less will the railroad be allowed to charge to get just compensation.

Therefore, if the price of steel is high it will cost more to build the railroad, and it will be felt by every shipper over it in the excessive rates of tolls. But if the price of steel rails is low it will cost less to build the railroad, and it will be felt by every shipper in the reduction of freight charges the company will be compelled therefor to make. Whatever, therefore, adds to the cost of construction adds to the freight charges and is felt by every man who ships or uses anything that is shipped over railroads.

There is a prohibitive tariff on iron and steel bars under which, in the last fiscal year, only 17,025 tons of these bars were imported, on which was collected a revenue of $133,476 only; while the price of rails was thereby raised about $10 a ton, so that the railroad companies were taxed by the steel trust about $10 a ton, and the patrons of the railroads were required to pay in proportion higher passenger and freight charges. This tariff tax was not levied on these rails to collect revenue for the Government, and collects for the Government a comparatively insignificant sum. It was levied to collect taxes for the steel trust and collects millions of dollars for that trust, and every man who ships freight or uses freight that is shipped over railroads has charged against him a higher rate to make good that levy of robbery.

I intended to read an able article on this tariff on steel rails, found in the Washington Post a few days ago, but I find that I have mislaid it. It so forcibly presents the subject that I regret its misplacement.

Here is an opportunity for the Republican party to strike a blow for the reduction of freight rates that will benefit shippers and everybody else everywhere. Repeal the iniquitous prohibitive tariff on iron and steel.

When this bill shall become a law—as I am confident it will in some shape—let it be a law that will give the full measure of relief and remedy craved by the people. Do not let it be an act to pacify public demand without filling the measure of public hopes.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I expected to take the floor at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Mississippi for the purpose of discussing the rate bill, but it is an inconvenient hour for Senators, and I will proceed with my remarks at 2 o'clock, or as soon thereafter as the bill is taken up.

Mr. HEYBURN. I offer certain amendments to House bill 12987—the rate bill. I ask that the amendment I send to the desk may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

On page 20, line 2, insert the following:

"That any party who shall have made complaint in the manner herein provided to the Interstate Commerce Commission against any common carrier charging such common carrier with charging, demanding, or publishing an unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, preferential, or prejudicial rate, charge, or practice for or in connection with the transportation of any proper subject of interstate commerce, which such complaining party may offer, or may desire to offer, for transportation by the said common carrier, and the said Interstate Commerce Commission shall make and enter a decision against the claim made by such complaining party in regard to such rate charged or to be charged, then such complaining party may cause to be reviewed by the United States circuit court sitting in the district in which the said cause of complaint has arisen the proceedings had before such Interstate Commerce Commission relative to the said complaint, which proceedings upon the demand of the complaining party shall be fully certified by the Interstate Commerce Commission to the United States circuit court aforesaid for review therein, and said proceedings so certified shall constitute the record to be considered and passed upon by the said circuit court.

"That the circuit courts of the United States shall, on behalf of either the complainant or carrier, have and exercise jurisdiction to review any final decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission establishing rates or conditions regulating interstate commerce under the provisions of this act. The jurisdiction of said circuit courts to review such proceedings shall attach upon the filing therein of a certified copy of the proceedings had before the Interstate Commerce Commission within thirty days after the making of the order to be reviewed, which said proceedings shall constitute all of the record upon which said review may be had. And upon the filing thereof the jurisdiction of said circuit court shall fully attach for the purpose of determining all questions of law and fact presented by said record, and the entering of judgment therein according to the law and the premises; and the hearing and consideration of such cases by the said circuit court shall be prompt, and such cases shall have priority in hearing and determination over all other cases, except criminal cases.

"That the said circuit court shall have power to make and issue all necessary interlocutory orders and writs for the preservation of the rights of the parties litigant pending the hearing and determination of the review of the proceedings of the Interstate Commerce Commission: Provided, That no order or writ shall be made suspending the operation of the order under review, except upon the party asking for such order giving an indemnity bond in such sum as the court or judge thereof may direct, or depositing the amount of such indemnity with the court subject to its order. And the liability under such indemnity bond or deposit shall cover the costs of the hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission and the review by the circuit or Supreme Court, together with the amount of money involved in the controversy to be reviewed. And no stay of the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be allowed under any order or writ made or issued by the circuit court for a period of more than sixty days, at the expiration of which time, should the parties seeking to have the proceedings of the Interstate Commerce Commission reviewed desire a further stay, they must show to the said court or judge thereof that they have been and are exercising due diligence in the preparation and prosecution of the action, and that injustice would result from the refusal to grant such extension of time.

"That the circuit court having jurisdiction of the case shall at all times be open for any purpose or proceeding in the exercise of the jurisdiction herein conferred for the review of the orders and proceedings of the Interstate Commerce Commission and for receiving, considering, and determining interlocutory orders pertaining thereto, regardless of the term time of the said circuit court, and all such hearings upon any matter pertaining to the review of such decision by the said circuit court may be had before the said circuit court, and any interlocutory or final order, decision, or decree of the said circuit court may be made, entered, and enforced by appropriate proceedings without regard to the regular term of the said court.

"That the decisions of the United States circuit courts upon a review of any of the proceedings of the Interstate Commerce Commission as aforesaid or of any matter pertaining thereto shall be final, except that whenever it shall be made to appear by verified petition to the Supreme Court of the United States or to a justice thereof, upon the presentation of the certified copy of the record upon which the final judgment of the circuit court is based, that any of the rights of the contesting parties under the Constitution of the United States have been violated by a denial of such rights of the parties to such controversy by the order, judgment, or decree under review, then and in that case the Supreme Court or a justice thereof may, by appropriate order or writ, cause the record of the proceedings of the said circuit court to be certified to the Supreme Court of the United States for review thereby, and upon such review only such portions of the record as involve the determination of the rights of the litigants under the Constitution of the United States shall be considered or determined. And the Supreme Court shall have the power to make such orders and issue such writs as, in its judgment, are necessary to protect the rights of the parties litigant, pending a hearing and determination of the cause, to the same extent as is herein provided in this behalf during the pendency of the review of such cause in the circuit court: Provided, That the proceedings for the review of the judgment of the circuit court in such case, whether by appeal or otherwise, in the Supreme Court of the United States shall be commenced by the filing of a certified transcript of the record, proceedings, and judgment or decree had in the said circuit court in said cause with the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States within thirty days after the entry of such judgment by the said circuit court, and that thereafter the consideration by the Supreme Court of the United States of such causes shall have priority in hearing and determination over all other causes except criminal causes, but the pendency of such review in the said Supreme Court of the United States shall not vacate or suspend the order appealed from except in the manner or under the conditions as hereinbefore provided in the case of the proceeding in the circuit court to review the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

"That any order made by the Interstate Commerce Commission fixing or regulating interstate traffic rates, or any matters pertaining thereto under the authority vested in said Commission by law, shall be in force from time of the making of such order by the said Commission, and shall only be suspended in the manner hereinbefore provided."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. HEYBURN. I offer further amendments to the rate bill, which I ask be printed and lie on the table.

The amendments were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

Amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. HEYBURN to H. R. 12987, an act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

On page 11, line 9, after the word "jurisdiction," add the words "upon a review at the instance of the party upon whose complaint the Commission acted, or the common carrier against whom such complaint was made."

On page 13, line 18, after the word "within," strike out the words "two years" and insert the words "six months."

On page 13, line 21, after the word "within," strike out the words "one year" and insert in lieu thereof the words "six months."

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I ask permission to offer another amendment to the railroad rate bill, which I will send to the desk and ask that it be printed in the RECORD, and that it be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

The amendment referred to is as follows:

On page 3, after section 1, insert the following:

"That for the purpose of enabling the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine the basis upon which to ascertain what rates shall be just and reasonable, the said Commission shall require any common carrier against whom complaint shall be made under the provisions of this act to file with said Commission, at its office in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, a copy of its articles of incorporation, together with any amendments or supplemental articles adopted by it, duly certified by the secretary of state, or officer corresponding thereto of the State, Territory, district, insular possession, or foreign country wherein such corporation shall have been incorporated, and shall also file in like manner a copy of any and all by-laws of such corporation duly certified by the president or vice-president thereof, and under the seal thereof, attested by the secretary of the corporation.

"That at the time of filing the articles of incorporation and by-laws of any corporation as hereinbefore provided, and on or before June 30 in every succeeding year, the corporation so filing the same shall file with said Commission a statement, verified by the oath of its president or vice-president, fully setting forth as follows:

"First. The name of the corporation and the place and date of incorporation.

"Second. The names, residence, and business or occupation of the officers of the corporation.

"Third. The business in which the corporation is actually engaged, and in what States, Territories, districts, or insular possessions it is engaged in transacting such business.

"Fourth. The cash value of the assets of the corporation and the nature and character of such assets.

"Fifth. The amount of indebtedness of the corporation, and, if such indebtedness is secured, in what manner.

"Sixth. A statement in detail of all bonds and mortgages issued by and outstanding against said corporation, showing when said bonds were issued and when the same become due, and the consideration received by the corporation for said bonds in property or money, and, if in property, the nature and cash value of such property and where situated; and in case of mortgages, showing the date of such mortgages, the date of their maturity, the property covered thereby, and the cash value thereof.

"Seventh. The amount of shares of stock or bonds owned or controlled by said corporation in any other corporation, and the proportion of the entire capital stock which such holding represents, both in the reporting corporation and the corporation whose shares it holds.

"Eighth. The amount of assets and liabilities of any corporation in which such reporting corporation holds stock or bonds, giving the character of such assets and liabilities and of what such assets and liabilities consist.

"Ninth. The number of shares of the capital stock of the corporation which have been actually issued, and the amount and value of the consideration actually received into the treasury of the corporation for such shares; where the payment was made in money, then the amount in money per share; where such payment was made in property, a description of such property as to location, character, and the cash value thereof.

"Tenth. That no other stock of any character has been issued or is outstanding than that so reported.

"Eleventh. That the corporation has issued no other bonds, mortgages, or other evidence of indebtedness than those stated in said report to have been issued.

"Twelfth. The amount expended for extensions, construction, and improvements each year, and where expended, and the character thereof.

"Thirteenth. The earning receipts from each branch of the business and from all sources, the operating and other expenses, balances of profit and loss, and a complete exhibit of the financial operations of the carrier each year, including an annual balance sheet. Such reports shall also contain information in relation to rates or regulations concerning freights or fares, or agreements or arrangements or contracts affecting the same, as the Commission may require. Such detailed report shall contain all the required statistics for a period of twelve months ending on the 30th day of June of each year, and shall be made under oath and filed with the Commission, at its office in Washington, on or before the 20th day of September then next following unless additional time may be granted in any case by the Commission. And if any carrier, person, or corporation subject to the provisions of this act shall fail to make and file such annual report within the time above specified, or within the time extended by the Commission for making and filing the same, or shall fail to make specific answer to any question authorized by the provisions of this section within thirty days from the time it is lawfully required so to do, such parties shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $100 for each and every day it shall be in default in respect thereto. The Commission shall also have authority to require said carrier to file monthly reports of earnings and expenses or special reports within a specified period, and if any such carrier shall fail to file such reports of earnings and expenses or special reports within a specified period, and if any such carrier shall fail to file such report within the time fixed by the Commission, it shall be subject to the forfeitures last above provided. Said forfeitures shall be recovered in the manner provided for the recovery of forfeitures under the provisions of this act. Any oath required to be taken in this act may be taken before any person authorized to administer an oath by laws of the State in which the same is taken.

"Fourteenth. That it is engaged in no other business than that set forth in the report."

ABATEMENT OF NUISANCES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. There are quite a number of District of Columbia bills on the Calendar, and if I could get an opportunity I should like to have two or three of them passed to-day in the interim.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4461) to provide for the abatement of nuisances in the District of Columbia by the Commissioners of said District, and for other purposes.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONDEMNATION OF INSANITARY BUILDINGS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg the indulgence of the Senate to ask for the consideration of the next Order of Business, a bill covering another condition in the District of Columbia that ought to be cured. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 47) to create a board for the condemnation of insanitary buildings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PETTUS. There will be no time now to debate that bill, and some of us want to state some objections to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will lie over.

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill was reported from the committee with an amendment, which is a simple one. I ask that it be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, line 21, after the word "purpose," insert:

One-half from the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the bill will be regarded as being before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the Chair will put the question on agreeing to the amendment. Shall the amendment be agreed to?

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now let the bill go over as amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

JACOB PICKENS.

Mr. WARNER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8717) for the relief of Jacob Pickens.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to Jacob Pickens, of Neosho, Mo., $208.44, being the amount stolen from a registered letter belonging to Pickens and collected by the United States Government from a mail contractor, and being now in the United States Treasury.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN M. BURKS.

Mr. BURKETT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1344) for the relief of John M. Burks.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to John M. Burks, of Lincoln, Nebr., $50, for fine unlawfully collected from him.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHAMBERLAIN LAND DISTRICT, SOUTH DAKOTA.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15328) to approve certain final proofs in the Chamberlain land district, South Dakota.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESA VERDE NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3245) creating the Mesa Verde National Park.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. PATTERSON. My colleague [Mr. TELLER] offered some amendments to the bill, which I am quite willing to accept.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first amendment proposed by the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lines 6 and 7, page 4, strike out the word "restoration" and insert in lieu thereof the word "preservation."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment proposed by the senior Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all of section 4, after the word "months," in line 2, page 5, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That all laws of the United States in force in the State of Colorado concerning mines and mining shall be and remain in full force and effect within said national park; and patents shall issue for mines heretofore or hereafter located within said park as in other parts of Colorado: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may designate bounds not to exceed one-half mile in all directions from any of the ruins intended to be preserved hereby and including the same, within which bounds the above proviso shall not be operative.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment submitted by the senior Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill the following as a new section:

SEC. 5. That nothing in this act shall prevent the service of writs or warrants, or any other legal process issued out of any of the State or other courts, the same as though this act had not been adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALASKA SHORT LINE RAILWAY AND NAVIGATION COMPANY'S RAILROAD.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask the indulgence of the Senate for unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4256) for the relief of the Alaska Short Line Railway and Navigation Company's Railroad, as I shall be going away tomorrow for about ten days.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes that the time of the Alaska Short Line Railway and Navigation Company to comply with the provisions of sections 4 and 5 of chapter 299 of the laws of the United States entitled "An act extending the homestead laws and providing for the right of way for railroads in the district of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved May 14, 1898, in acquiring and completing its railroad now under construction in Alaska, be extended as follows:

First. The time to file the map and profile of definite location of its second section of at least 20 miles with the register of the land office in the district of Alaska, as provided in said sections 4 and 5, is hereby extended to and including the 20th day of March, 1907.

Second. The time to complete the first section of at least 20 miles of its railroad, as provided in said section 5, is hereby extended to and including the 20th day of March, 1907, and such railroad and navigation company shall be entitled to all the benefits conferred upon it by the provisions of such act upon its due compliance with all the provisions thereof, excepting only the provisions thereof relating to the filing of the map and profile of definite location of its second section of not less than 20 miles of its road: Provided, That it shall have successively one year each after said 20th day of March, 1907, in which to file the map and profile of its definite location of the succeeding sections of not less than 20 miles each: And provided further, That it shall have five years in which to complete its entire line from Illamna Bay to the Yukon River.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ABATEMENT OF NUISANCES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. PETTUS. In relation to House bill 4461, in reference to declaring certain houses in the District of Columbia to be nuisances, which passed the Senate a few moments ago, I move to reconsider the vote by which it was passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the motion to reconsider is agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Do I understand the motion prevails, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion prevails.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to question that vote, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will put the question again.

Mr. PETTUS. I desire to say something upon the bill before it is finally acted on, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question on the motion of the Senator from Alabama will be again put.

Mr. PETTUS. I understood the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] was going to address the Senate at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the Senator's motion was evidently not understood by the Senate when it agreed to reconsider. So the Chair will again put the question.

Mr. PETTUS. I desire that the motion go over until the proper time, when the Senator in charge of the bill may call it up. I want to address the Senate on it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands, then, the Senator from Alabama desires merely to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. PETTUS. I simply enter the motion, and ask that it be noted, to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and then let the motion go over until such time as the bill may be called up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I want to take a moment, and only a moment, to address myself to the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] to reconsider the vote by which House bill 4461 was passed a few moments ago. The Senator from Alabama said the bill related to the destruction of buildings in the District of Columbia. The bill does not relate to that subject at all, I will say to the Senator, and I trust he will read the bill carefully before his motion is put.

I want simply to add that for five years the very best people in this District, and all the associations that have to do with the welfare of the people of the District, as well as some of the good people outside of the District, have been urging this legislation, and I have given a great deal of thought and time to it, as has the committee of which I chance to be chairman.

I trust the Senator will press his motion to reconsider at an early day, and then we will discuss it and act upon it.

Mr. PETTUS. I have said the Senator may call it up at any time.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is satisfactory.

Mr. PETTUS. I merely want to have an opportunity to state my objections to the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider has been entered.

GOVERNMENT POWDER FACTORY.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask permission, Mr. President, to have inserted in the RECORD a letter from Robert S. Waddell, esq., the president of the Buckeye Powder Company, of Peoria, Ill. It is apropos of a subject which has been discussed here and in answer to another letter which was put in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

PEORIA, ILL., April 2, 1906.

Senator JOHN W. DANIEL,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In the RECORD of the 29th ultimo, the letter of Mr. G. M. Peters, president King Powder Company, contradicts my statements and I beg to submit the following reply:

My letter to you reads: "Business men recite the experience of the King Powder Company," and I then state the facts recited, and add that "I was on the other side and chuckled over the results. And then the 'King' went into the 'trust.'"

To this Mr. Peters replies:

"If Mr. Waddell made such statement, we wish to say that it is * * *, nothing of the kind ever having occurred or ever having been thought of by us.

"We wish further to say, in contradiction of Mr. Waddell's statement as reported, that the King Powder Company does not belong and never has belonged to a 'powder trust,' and, furthermore, that we do not believe there is such a thing in existence as a 'powder trust.'"

The incident of packing Du Pont powder in King kegs was mentioned not to injure the King company, but to illustrate the difficulties that many business men speak of experiencing in the past when competing against a "trust" that maintains a strong lobby at Washington. This incident occurred several years ago, has been often related by those conversant with the details, is generally believed to be true, and has never hitherto been disputed, so far as I know.

Although not present in person to witness each step in the deal, I have never doubted the full truth as reported, for it was in harmony with kindred acts of Great Western Powder Company, John King, founder, the name of which company was changed to King Powder Company, in honor of its president, after his demise and the advent of Mr. Peters in the business. King bought a large quantity of powder from the Government which had been made by Du Pont, Hazard, and Laflin & Rand, deteriorated, was condemned and sold. King reglazed the powder, packed it in his own kegs and sold it under "Continental" brand made by King's mills. I also know that Messrs. Du Pont maintained a suit against a Cincinnati firm and forced it to discontinue packing King powder in Du Pont kegs and selling it as of the latter make. Reference is made to the court records. Knowing that Mr. Peters's predecessors were not strangers to trade deceptions and that Mr. Peters is now packing King powder under Du Pont and Hazard labels, I still credit the reports made to us as stated.

This is an immaterial issue, the important feature being Mr. Peters's statement.

"We wish further to say, in contradiction of Mr. Waddell's statement as reported, that the King Powder Company does not belong and never has belonged to a 'powder trust,' and, furthermore, that we do not believe there is such a thing in existence as a 'powder trust.'"

I am glad to get this "rise" out of a trust magnate, but realize that in defending against anyone who may be troubled with "mental reservations" it is necessary to resort to definitions. In all my representations to the Congress I have used the word "trust" in its broadest sense, as covering any and all organizations of powder manufacturers, acting contrary to and in defiance of the Sherman or national antitrust law. Whether it be called association, agreement, syndicate, pool, trust, understanding, or other name, if its action resulted in fixing or regulating prices, dividing, apportioning, or limiting production of powder in restraint of trade or to destroy competition, it is covered by the commonly accepted term "trust," and Mr. Peters so understands me, for he knows I refer to powder deals that are prohibited by national and State laws. The Du Pont trust not only comes under this general definition, but on certain kinds of powder, like Army and Navy smokeless, it is a trust in the most limited sense, enjoying an absolute and exclusive monopoly, and Mr. Peters knows my representations are true.

I repeat the statement that the King Powder Company, by the personal agreement of G. M. Peters, president, is and has been for many years a party to a "trust." The last one was formed in 1896, and it was in the form of a pool. The following are the percentages of each company in said pool:

Percentages of 1896 pool on blasting powder.

	Per cent.
Du Pont, Hazard, and Sycamore (3 companies)	30.52
Laflin & Rand and Schaghticoke (2 companies)	22.44
Oriental	5.02
American	4.44
Austin	5.00
Miami	5.11
King	4.60
Ohio	3.20
Marcellus	1.53
Lake Superior	1.53
Chattanooga	4.98
Equitable	4.14
Phœnix	4.89
Birmingham	2.25
Globe	.35
	100.00

This included a total of about 4,000,000 kegs of blasting powder, of which the percentage of the King Powder Company was 4.60. That is, of the total sales of all of the companies in the pool, amounting to 4,000,000 kegs, the share of the King Powder Company would be 4.60 per cent, or say, 184,000 kegs per year. The price of this powder was fixed by the advisory committee, composed of T. C. Du Pont; Col. Henry A. Du Pont; A. J. Moxham, president of Hazard Powder Company; A. O. Fay, president Miami-American; A. Lent, president of Austin Powder Company, and F. W. Olin, president of Equitable Powder Company. The agreement between the King Powder Company and the other companies was that the other members of the pool should fix the prices, and "King" agreed to follow them. The King company was a constant disturber of prices, and always failed to keep its agreements with associates. It became necessary, in order to maintain the established price, that the blasting-powder product of the King mills must be controlled. Certain officials of the other powder companies formed the King Mercantile Company, principal offices, Cincinnati, and bought the product of the King Powder Company for a term of twenty-five years. The price paid for this powder is the average price fixed by the "trust" for the territory lying between New England and the Mississippi River. All of the King blasting powder is marketed by this King Mercantile Company, and Mr. Peters has received his checks with regularity. Each of the principals, Mr. Peters included, or some other officer of his company, made a sworn statement to the "trust" secretary, between the 1st and 7th of each month, of the number of kegs sold during the preceding month. The King Mercantile Company now attends to this part of the "trust" business. The price is fixed by the "trust," as I have stated, and Mr. Peters agrees to and accepts it.

There was another and separate pool or trust governing sporting powder. This particular kind was not purchased and marketed by the King Mercantile Company. The most of it is sold by King Powder Company or is used in loading shells and metallic ammunition by the Peters Cartridge Company, of which Mr. Peters is the founder. Under the sporting-powder pool the King Powder Company's percentage is 5.4342.

Article 4 of the "understanding," as Mr. Peters and associates call it, provides that sworn statements of sales by an officer of each company shall be sent in quarterly and "statements in adjustment" are made up, and the last paragraph of section 4 reads:

"Payments to be made by those who shall have sold in excess shall be made through the treasurer and within thirty days from the date of the statement in adjustment, and the money so paid through him shall be divided as soon as practicable among those whose sales have been in deficiency."

I have before me, selected at random, one of these "statements in adjustment" for the twenty-fourth period. I will omit the items of the blasting settlement and give the sporting tables because shorter. The table of payments shows the settlement with King on both kinds and amount of check received by King Powder Company:

EDWARD GREEN, Secretary.

NEW YORK, N. Y., August 20, 1902.

The price of King powder in the vicinity of Cincinnati is very low in order to destroy a local independent manufacturer. The average price fixed by the trust in territory between New England and Mississippi River is higher, and King Powder Company is a party to and accepts these conditions. Further, the King company packs powder in kegs made at its plant, bearing Du Pont and Hazard brands, and such powder is now daily sold as of Du Pont and Hazard manufacture and with the full knowledge and agreement of Mr. Peters.

Mr. Peters's training in the pulpit makes him cautious against breaking laws, and he has said his company can not be a party to any association, pool, or "trust." He for a time stood outside the door, agreed to abide by the action of associates, but he must have a larger quota of the division, then sent his pals into the room to fix prices, apportion the trade of the country, hold up the American people and allow Peters a bigger share of the "swag." When he found no one had gone to State prison his courage arose and he attended powder-trust meetings, filed and prosecuted charges against agents, argued eloquently for higher prices, approved ways and means to crush independent competitors, and served on "trust" committees.

The proofs of all this and more in form of documents that I hold are too voluminous to print, but are open to inspection.

On file at the capitols of Illinois, Missouri, and many other States are statements of the officers of these powder companies, made under oath, that their companies are not parties to any association, agreement, pool, trust, or understanding for the fixing of prices on any commodity, etc.

I now urgently call upon the Attorney-General of the United States and of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, Missouri, and Kansas, where the "trust" is operating mills, to afford these parties an opportunity to appear before the courts and, without mental reservation or secret evasion of mind, to vindicate themselves from the specific charges I make by disclosing the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, or pay the penalty for willful infraction of the laws of States and nation. I pledge myself to furnish all and more proofs than is necessary to determine the cases. I agree to voluntarily attend and jog the memory of Mr. Peters and others of the above and hundreds of other acts wherein they knowingly and willfully have and are now levying extortions on the people and Government in defiance of law.

Respectfully, ROBERT S. WADDELL.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being House bill 12987.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll; and the following Senators responded to their names:

Allison	Clarke, Ark.	Hansbrough	Pettus
Ankeny	Culiom	Heyburn	Piles
Bailey	Daniel	Kean	Rayner

Burkett	Foster	McLaurin	Warner
Burrows	Frye	Money	Warren
Carter	Fulton	Morgan	Wetmore
Clapp	Gallinger	Nixon
Clark, Mont.	Gearin	Overman

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I wish to address the Senate on some existing conditions and the remedy under consideration for their reformation. I will confine my remarks to the bill now before the Senate, without reference to any amendment that has been proposed to it, as no amendment has been suggested that removes my difficulties in giving it my support. There are vital constitutional questions presented in this bill that have been carefully ignored in this debate that can not be suppressed.

The bill claims to be an amendment of the existing law. In fact it is a repeal of that law in some of its vital principles which are, in its actual recitals, based upon the express language of the Constitution of the United States. These principles, which relate expressly to the right of trial by jury and to the constitutional separation of the jurisdiction of the courts of law and courts of equity, are excluded from this bill and repealed by its provisions, for the manifest purpose of preventing the people from exercising the right to demand jury trials in the Federal courts and in all other courts on the questions of rate charges of railroads engaged in the transportation of interstate commerce. The reasonableness of such rates is always a question to be tried by a jury that no State or Federal court can take away from either party to a suit when the remedy at law is plain, adequate and complete. Verdicts of juries settle all questions of the reasonableness of charges by common carriers in suits in the courts of law, and their verdicts are final when they are not set aside on motion for a new trial. These rights, secured by the seventh amendment and so stated in the existing law, are stricken out of this bill.

The text of the existing law on this subject that is stricken out is as follows:

> If the matters involved in any such order or requirement of said Commission are founded upon a controversy requiring a trial by jury, as provided by the seventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and any such common carrier shall violate or refuse or neglect to obey or perform the same, after notice given by said Commission as provided in the fifteenth section of this act, it shall be lawful for any person or company interested in such order or requirement to apply in a summary way by petition to the circuit court of the United States sitting as a court of law in the judicial district in which the carrier complained of has its principal office, or in which the violation or disobedience of such order or requirement shall happen, alleging such violation or disobedience, as the case may be; and said court shall, by its order, then fix a time and place for the trial of said cause, which shall not be less than twenty nor more than forty days from the time said order is made, and it shall be the duty of the marshal of the district in which said proceeding is pending to forthwith serve a copy of said petition and of said order upon each of the defendants, and it shall be the duty of the defendants to file their answers to said petition within ten days after the service of the same upon them as aforesaid. At the trial the findings of fact of said Commission as set forth in its report shall be prima facie evidence of the matters therein stated, and if either party shall demand a jury or shall omit to waive a jury the court shall, by its order, direct the marshal forthwith to summon a jury to try the cause; but if all the parties shall waive a jury in writing, then the court shall try the issues in said cause and render its judgment thereon.

To get rid of trial by jury this amended bill also destroys the constitutional boundaries between Federal courts of law and courts of equity by conferring power upon Federal judges sitting for the trial of equity causes to hear and determine causes in which the remedy at law is plain, adequate, and complete.

This direct assault upon the Constitution is necessary for the success of this new plan of legislation. It can not succeed unless it can ride down or evade the express provisions of the Constitution of the United States, which define and protect the judicial powers of the courts created by the Constitution, and all its important provisions are framed for this purpose.

In a land of laws, where all rights, all property, and the lives and the liberties of the people are under the shelter and protection of laws enacted in pursuance of the Constitution, the effort is made, in supposed obedience to the will of the majority, which is a wild and mistaken misconception of the popular will, to destroy or ignore some of the most substantial foundations of our constitutional organism as a free government.

The people are not demanding the surrender of their constitutional right of trial by jury, and I can not vote to compel it.

All this is being done to establish and equip a national railroad commission which, when it has attained to its full powers, will, through political control and exploitation, embody and exert a power in the rule of the country greater than all other powers. It will have and will hold the mastery over the Federal Government, and over the States, under the principles on which this measure is based, never to be relinquished or destroyed. Once the railroads have full control of the Commission and are furnished with the compulsory powers vested in it by this bill, which they will soon acquire, they will compel obedience to their rule; and if the laws creating them should be changed hereafter, it will only be done to increase their power. They will see to it that changes in the law in the future will be made in that direction.

If the combined capital of the controllers of the so-called "interstate railroads" is sufficient to sustain their employees for six months, or for three months, a strike—a refusal to transport commerce among the States except upon their own terms—would tax all transportation and affect the facilities of commercial intercourse to an extent that would bring all their opponents to terms; and there is no power in this act to compel them to continue in the business of through transportation. In the absence of such power, the law will be futile and will fail of execution.

No wisdom or forecast of future events that may arise from known conditions can measure the danger to the country of the power of a national railroad commission under the control of the railroads. Controlled by popular will on the one hand, or by the combined capital of railroads on the other hand, when the Commission is absolved from control by the courts, through hostile and restrictive legislation, such as this measure provides, a national railroad commission would riot in abuses to satisfy the requirements of those who create it or control its appointment.

To provide against these destructive conditions, one or the other of which will certainly result from the enactment of the law as proposed by the majority of the committee, is a most difficult undertaking. Its consideration should be approached with the utmost caution, and the principles underlying its powers should be tested with the most deliberate, patient, and patriotic care.

This solemn and important duty involves inquiries into our Constitution, which is openly invaded by this measure, into the powers and jurisdiction of our courts, which it seeks to throttle or to destroy; and into the distribution of constitutional powers among the great Departments of our Government, which it proposes to concenter and amalgamate in the hands of a national railroad commission.

The bill proposes to repeal the law that every English-speaking people, and the Latin nations before them, have always maintained, that no fixed rate can be applied to the compensation of a common carrier that is not just and reasonable, to be freely measured by the conscience of a court.

There are questions of justice and equity in which it is impossible to measure the rights of a party by positive provisions of law, and the just compensation of common carriers has always been classed among such demands.

In all criminal cases the reasonable doubt of a single juror as to the guilty intention of the accused requires his acquittal, and the graver the accusation the greater the necessity for this power to be exercised by a jury. So in the case of self-defense, where a reasonable apprehension of death or great bodily harm will justify the killing of an assailant, a jury must judge of the reasonableness of the alleged justification.

In every aspect of trial by jury it is, of all the provisions of law, the best interpreter of justice modified by equity, reason, and good conscience in its application of the affairs of men. It is a liberty secured by the Constitution to the people to protect them against arbitrary and oppressive judges and chancellors and the possibility of judicial corruption.

This Senate will rue the day when it abolishes trial by jury in the adjudication of the reasonableness of rates of transportation by common carriers, which everybody admits are unlawful if they are not reasonable.

The railroad magnates who abuse the corporate powers granted them by the people of the States, in imposing burdens upon them that are too grievous to be borne, could not ask a safer retreat from the demands of justice, or one that is more coveted by them, than this measure furnishes them in discarding and abolishing all right of the people to bring them to justice before honest juries.

Reserve to the people the full right of jury trials and they will not, for very long, suffer injustice from those who have seized upon their railroads and their charter powers and are using them for their wrong and oppression.

The one ordeal that a railroad magnate dreads, above all others, is the stern and inflexible sense of justice that prevails in the jury box. Whatever others may do to shelter the criminals who are sacrificing the rights and interests of the people to gratify their greed for gold and its merciless exactions, I will not aid them in striking down the great constitutional barrier to their aggressions that our fathers provided in securing to the people the right of trial by jury.

This measure leaves no room for contesting the rulings or conduct of national railroad commissioners, except in the Federal courts and in the equity jurisdiction of those courts, in which no jury is empaneled to pass upon the reasonableness of the rates of freight it may impose upon the railroads or upon the people who own the railroads.

A special statutory procedure being provided in this bill for the trial of all questions involved in the acts, decrees, rulings, and orders of the national railroad commission, in respect of interstate railroads and their rate charges and discriminations, which proceedings must be conducted in the Federal courts, in the nature of a review or appeal from their decisions, it will be insisted, and most likely it will be held, that such special procedure provided by statute for this special purpose excludes all other tribunals, especially the State courts, from all jurisdiction to hear and determine the reasonableness of a freight rate imposed upon a shipper or a railroad by the national railroad commission.

The power to review, control, or controvert proceedings by mandamus or by injunction, so thoroughly discussed in this debate, is not given by this bill to State courts, whose powers are so buried under this avalanche of legal lore urged in favor of it that no regard is paid to them. They are industriously ignored in the debate and will never be heard of in future, because no right is left to any State to protect its own citizens against any injustice a national railroad commission may inflict upon them.

As to the State railroad commissions, they will be left in bucolic repose, to wonder at the magic that has given a paralytic stroke to all their important official functions.

When a carload of cotton shipped from Mobile to Boston, at a certain rate per ton per mile, is found in the same train with a carload of cotton, or a single bale of cotton, shipped from Mobile, Ala., to Bridgeport, Ala., at a higher or lower rate per mile per ton, the railroad commission of Alabama will have no easy time in calculating and collecting the freight rate to Bridgeport or in putting in force, as to a car or a single bale of cotton, the laws of Alabama intended to secure cotton destined to Bridgeport from the dangers of fire or the other many dangers of such transportation.

This illustration is only intended to call attention to the fact that, in thousands of instances, the national and State commissions will be brought into unavoidable conflict as to their respective rights and duties, on the same train of cars, as to commerce that is being transported to different destinations.

We know how such differences will end in the paramountcy of the national commission in every feature of control, and how the friends of the States and their rights will sit by, in this Chamber, and listen to the Philippics against "the horrors of the middle passage" repeated in the greater horrors of "jim-crow cars." In the end the United States will own or control all the railroads, including those that are now owned by the States. I am not anxious to live to see that day.

The principles of government on which such legislation is based should be admitted on all hands to be sound and clear; and the demand for the national railroad commission, that will supplant all State railroad commissions, as the shadow of a great oak chokes and destroys all other vegetation beneath it, should be only founded upon supreme national necessity. This bill is contested in the Senate on grave constitutional grounds by Senators who are in the front rank among publicists and international lawyers of the country, and are as true and conscientious men and as able as any who have sat in this tribunal.

Its wisdom is challenged by many of our wisest and most worthy Senators and Representatives, whose patriotism can not be questioned, and who ignore all partisan and political alliances and influences in their dealings with this subject. In such circumstances, I must seek such lines of action as are the clearest and least embarrassed with difficulties, and such as have received, in the most solemn form, the sanction of the people and government of Alabama. The States are the creators of these important machines of transportation, and can destroy them for any just and lawful cause.

Transportation by common carriers within a State is admitted on all hands to be a feature of commerce, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, that the State has the sovereign right to regulate, whether it is conducted by individuals, copartnerships, joint stock companies, or chartered corporations. In the case of railroad companies, the power of the State over them is far greater than it is with reference to all other classes of common carriers.

Railroad corporations can only exist in virtue of the express authority of the State from which their charter powers are derived. Their continued existence may be cut off and their powers may be exterminated by the action of the State, through its courts or by the repeal of their charters, for the violation of any prescribed duty or the omission to perform any duty imposed upon them by the law of the State. The United States does not hold such relations to any railroad that is chartered in any State and can not create such relations by legal compulsion.

Transportation by railroads and its regulation is a matter that can be regulated only by the States that create them, except when the transportation extends beyond the limits of such State and becomes interstate transportation of commerce. If the intent of the carrier and shipper is to engage in interstate commerce, the commerce transported is interstate commerce. If such is not the purpose of both parties, the transportation, within the limits of the State, is transportation of domestic commerce.

In one vital feature railroad corporations differ from all other common carriers. They own the highways upon which all their work as common carriers is done, and their highways are dedicated to the service, not to the use and control of the public, and such dedication is solely for the purposes of transportation. The nature of this service carries with it the right of the public to demand its performance for their service to a reasonable extent, in a reasonable way, and for a reasonable compensation; but the carrier can quit the business of interstate transportation if he so chooses, and neither Congress nor any Federal court can force him to resume that occupation.

With these qualifications, the transportation service that a railroad company, chartered by a State, must render to the public and to all shippers of commerce must be in the character of a common carrier whenever the right of eminent domain is exerted by a State in establishing the highway; for that right can only be exercised by the State in the condemnation of private property for the public use, and when such use is thus created it stands good to the public, and the State that created the use can execute it, through its courts, by the appointment of a receiver of the railroad, and so compel its execution.

This duty, which the corporation owes the State and its people, does not extend to all the people of the United States, like the use of navigable waters. The people at large are the real proprietors of the navigable waters for commercial purposes, and Congress can provide laws for securing to them the freedom of their navigation. The public uses of public railroads are in the proprietorship of the people of the State that created them and are subject exclusively to their legislative power as to their operations within the limits of the State. They can not refuse obedience to any law of the State that created them which conforms to the constitution of the States and of the United States and is not in violation of their charter rights.

In every charter of a railroad company created for the purpose of the transportation of commerce the carrier is a common carrier and not a private carrier. So that the chartered railroad companies acquire the exclusive right to the proprietorship of the designated highway, and their rights, duties, and responsibilities as common carriers are subject to control under State laws. They derive no powers from the laws of the United States and are not responsible to that Government for their existence, nor are they amenable to the laws of the United States for the violation of the State laws that control them if such laws are valid under the Constitution of the United States.

They have not, nor can they have, any right to violate the Constitution of the United States. If such a violation occurs, the act is simply void. If such act is done in the pursuance of a State law, such law is void, and there the matter stops.

The State railroad corporations are quite beyond the power of Congress to condemn them to extermination by repealing or forfeiting their charters. I am stating limitations of power that Congress can not transcend. Congress can not exercise such powers over State corporations by due process of law. Such powers reside only in the States that create such corporations. Until a State railroad is dedicated to the service of interstate transportation by some lawful act, it remains subject to its duty to the State that created it, and Congress can not compel such dedication without the express or the implied consent of such State.

Here, then, we have a great many railroad corporations, chartered by the States—possibly more than five hundred of them—that have the right and the duty of transporting commerce as common carriers within the respective States of their origin, without any possible legislative control by Congress so long as they transact such business within the States that created them and in accordance with the laws and constitutions of such States.

These States, respectively, have the sole right to enact laws for the regulation and control of these chartered railroads as to their operation within their limits. The right of regulation and control, when it is not limited in their charters or by the existence of some right of property or privilege that is within the category of vested rights, extends to all the business they conduct for the public within the limits of the States that created them.

It extends to the lawfulness and regularity of their meetings of stockholders and directors; to the control of the conduct of their officers, agents, employees, in so far as it affects shippers, passengers, or the general public; to all matters concerning timetables and connections with other railroads, and the speed of safety of travel or transportation; to the proper equipment of their cars, the use of brakes and other safety appliances; to the classification of passengers and freights; to regulating the transportation of diseased persons or animals for the preservation of the public health, and of dangerous freights, or of persons in the cars who are personally dangerous or obnoxious to others. Indeed, this power of control by the States extends to every part and instrumentality of a railroad chartered by them, from the roadbed up to the conductors and engineers that operate the trains, so far as they relate to the safety of the people or the general service and convenience of the public.

It is far too much to say that Congress can exert such control over railroads operating as carriers within the States, or that it has inherent or constitutional authority to exercise such control over all the railroads that are engaged in interstate transportation. If Congress has such power, it is not in virtue of the charter rights or duties of State railroads, for the States even could not confer such power on Congress to control their railroads, nor is it because Congress acquires any proprietorship of a State road that engages in transporting interstate commerce. In such a case the unlawful act is that of the carrier, not of the owner of the property he is transporting. It is not the railroad, but the owner that commits the wrong of charging unlawful rates to shippers. Therefore the proceeding for condemnation can not be in rem, but must be in personam, and must be for the violation of some duty that the carrier owes to the people of the United States. Such a relation can only arise from the exercise of some public duty that the carrier assumes voluntarily upon entering upon the business of a carrier of interstate commerce.

When such public service is lawful within the provisions of its charter, or with the consent of the State, Congress can accept the situation so created as a dedication of such service to the general public use, as a navigable water course is dedicated by law, or usage, to the like service.

It is the element of consent, express or implied, that gives to Congress the right and power to control State corporations that enter voluntarily into the business of transporting interstate commerce. Congress can forbid them if it so chooses, or it can prescribe terms and conditions as to railroads that enter into this field of business pursuits, but it can not force those State corporations to become transporters of interstate commerce or to continue in such business, and here is the fatal error of this measure.

It is the absence of mandatory power over State railroads that Congress can not possess and that the States can not confer upon Congress as legislative power that prevents Congress from compelling them to continue in the business of transporting interstate commerce when the owners of the railroads choose to withdraw from it.

This sort of control and regulation, by compulsion, can never be exercised by Congress unless the United States, disregarding the laws and constitutions of all the States, shall repeal all these State charters and substitute them with charters enacted by Congress. The impossibility of such a destruction and confiscation of property needs not to be discussed in the Senate of the United States, while the Constitution protects all property from confiscation and forbids it from being subject to condemnation for public uses except by due process of law. I need not occupy the time of the Senate in the discussion of a matter that is so obviously absurd and impossible.

Among other things the States may do in the control of railroads chartered by them is to prohibit them, as common carriers, from the transportation of freights or passengers beyond the limits of the States from which they derived their charters, under contracts with the railroads of other States.

No State can lawfully prohibit common carriers not chartered under its laws from engaging in such business, but the power of a State over its own creature is quite equal to the right to prohibit such corporations from engaging in the transportation of commerce among other States. It is a part of the law of its existence that a corporation shall not transcend or violate the laws prescribed to it by the State that created it, and that it may be dissolved because of such acts.

The States, therefore, have it in their power to forbid their railroad corporations from entering into any agreements with the railroad corporations of other States for the transportation of commerce; or they may authorize their railroads to make such agreements with the railroads of other States to transport interstate commerce under such terms and conditions as the laws of the United States may prescribe.

In case of gross injustice to a State by the action of a national railroad commission in so arranging differentials and preferences as to discriminate against certain States or their seaports, it can not be said that a State that is thus wronged may not forbid its railroad corporations, on pain of dissolution, from assisting the national railroad commission in its operations in respect of such commercial regulations. This is not an extreme view of a condition that may happen or is even remote. It is only a comment on conditions that have occurred. Such wrongs are now made the subject of much complaint.

Very many illustrations, drawn from bitter experience, could be cited to show that it is not the question of rates, to last for a period of three years, as provided in this measure, that will bring on the heavy fighting over its provisions in future.

The rate question is a mere bagatelle as compared with the contests that will certainly arise between seaboard States and between State railroad commissions and a national railroad commission. If they are not permitted to be decided in the courts on the complaint of any State, or of any person, or community that has suffered wrong and injustice, they will be decided by other means, political or belligerent, that will insure redress.

In dealing with the subject of rate regulation in respect of commerce among the States we again adopted the plan in this measure that was founded on fatal error in 1887, and are making our mistake more obvious and the more distressing the further we go in the same direction.

We are assuming, in this measure, that railroads that form continuous lines, by physical connections and continuous routes of transportation between many and distant States, by agreements that provide for certain freight rates and certain percentages of the division of the fares, have thereby subjected themselves, as matter of law, to an obligation or duty to continue the business on different terms, to be prescribed by the national railroad commission. Such agreements are the only obligations that now connect this vast system of railroads in through routes of transportation. Congress can not change their terms and compel obedience to new or substituted terms by mandamus proceedings in the courts or otherwise.

Congress can not adopt such agreements as valid arrangements for constituting through routes of interstate commerce and in the same breath denounce them or reform them as to the freight rates fixed by such agreements. Congress can not hold the contracting railroads to their agreement to transport interstate commerce while it denounces and punishes them for excessive charges prescribed in the same contract.

This is exactly what is proposed to be done under the provisions of this bill as to the railroads that are engaged, under mutual agreements, in transporting interstate commerce.

If these agreements were lawful when they were made (because they were not prohibited and were based upon good and valuable considerations), they can not be altered by act of Congress, nor can they be made criminal by post factum laws. If they were unlawful, Congress can not reform them by changing their terms or their effect by statutes that can relate back and cure them. But Congress can disregard them and proceed to legislate as if they had no existence.

Congress can enact that any State railroad corporation, thereunto duly empowered by the law of the State of its creation, may conduct the business of transporting interstate commerce upon terms and conditions prescribed in the law granting such privilege after the conditions have been expressed in a statute.

These conditions may include all the restrictions in this bill, and others, if Congress is disposed to share in the hostility to railroads that even this bill does not express.

When the State authorizes their railroads to accept such terms, there is an end to the controversy; and their railroad commissioners and their legislatures will be strongly inclined to adopt the rates prescribed by the national railroad commission as the standard of domestic rates of transportation within their limits.

On this basis even the questions of reasonable rates and remunerative rates may cease their conflict, which can never be settled finally by any power except the cooperation of the States with the Federal Government. It is about time that the United States were trying this plan for securing the general welfare.

The demand for the control of railroad transportation is of sudden growth, and has been the result of rapid and enormous expansion of our domestic commerce, in which the railroad transportation has been a chief if not a controlling factor. Without the tremendous extension of transportation by rail the growth of our domestic commerce would not have been nearly so rapid.

But it must be remembered that this enormous increase in commerce is very largely due to State railroads, some of which are in State ownership, and their rights must and will be respected. The people will require this at the hands of Congress and the courts.

This new era of internal trade has invited capital from all over the world into railway investments. Such investments represent many billions of dollars—probably, all told, more than twenty billions.

These stocks and bonds have become the treasuries of capital, at interest and profit, for a great number of people, and it has become the ambition, pride, and cupidity of the greatly rich to concentrate financial investments and power in such holdings. The trust combinations and the holding companies have concentrated this enormous power in few hands, until less than fifty railroad magnates in the United States are now in virtual control of more than 250,000 miles of railroad, and are the sponsors to the owners of the stocks and bonds that represent all this vast property.

Such a power, in a republic, will control its destiny, if it is not held in check by the national power, or, better, by the united power of the States and the Federal Government. I admit, with fear and trembling for the future of our country, that this concentrated power of railroad ownership and control must be subjected to the control of the law, at the peril of our safety from the despotism of an oligarchy of capitalists, or the worse peril of a destructive cyclone of popular resentment and socialistic jealousies that will destroy the protection of property which, when it is lost, leaves nothing but wreckage in the track of the storm.

The united powers of the State and Federal governments, in firm and patriotic cooperation, were never more necessary for the safety of good constitutional government.

It is an unsafe calculation that the control of Congress by the power or the forces that have concentrated these many billions of money invested in the ownership of our railroads in the hands of a few men will prevent them from dominating the Federal Government and from the overlordship of all our industries and the traffic they create, if the States are excluded from their proper influence in the control of the railroads. Their power is indispensable to the safety of the country, as against the power of these aggregations of vast wealth in the hands of railroad magnates.

The sole power, force, or influence that has caused capitalists to load their billions into our railroad securities and properties has been the assured safety of a steady income from the profits of the transportation of commerce among the States and the other incidental profits and advantages that arise from that source, such as the building up of great cities and great factories, and the increase in value of land holdings along or near these railroad lines. They could no more afford to lose the control of interstate railroad lines over this splendid country than they could afford to burn half their stocks and bonds.

With the leverage afforded by such conditions, to enable the States and the Federal Government, in cooperation, to regulate commerce among the States by regulating the instrumentalities of such commerce and their operations to promote the general welfare, no task could be more simple and, to me, no privilege would be more inviting than to assist in its success.

The States can do this single handed, but it might cause great losses in the suspension of the courses and currents of commercial intercourse were the States to deny to their railroads the right to make agreements for through routes for transporting interstate commerce, except upon conditions that their laws shall prescribe.

The United States can control the entire field of interstate operations and suppress all the frauds and crimes with which it is infested by a series of simple enactments, civil and criminal. The penal enactments now on the statute books are nearly sufficient to repress railroad crimes relating to rates, rebates, preferences, and discriminations.

But, to prevent the possible capture of a majority of the national railroad commission by the monopolists, the power of the States held in reserve to prevent them from enjoying the profits and advantages of through routes would make them content to do business with the people on just terms.

A statute to prohibit any railroad company from transporting commerce among or between the States except in compliance with regulations prescribed by Congress, and prohibiting such companies now engaged in such commerce under agreement with other companies from obstructing commerce by the abandonment of their agreements for that purpose and with that intent, say, within a year from the date of the enactment, and making the voluntary act of abandonment within a certain time presumptive evidence of guilt, would give to Congress or the commission the power to fix, adjust, and change rates which would become binding on the railroad companies as conditions upon which they may engage or continue in the business of transporting commerce among the States. These conditions may be formulated in a license issued by the national railroad commission, after due investigation in respect of combinations among the railroads to control rates, such as pooling agreements, rebates, allowances, and other matters tending to avoid the law.

As the United States has no ownership of the railroads in any respect and has not granted any of the charters under which they exist and are owned by the stockholders and are held under mortgages to the bondholders, and as the railroads are under the exclusive control of the States that created them, the legislation of Congress can only relate to their operations in the business of transporting commerce between or among the States as common carriers.

This business requires to be regulated by Congress, because Congress alone can regulate commerce among the States. But this power does not extend to the regulation of the instrumentalities of transportation that are under the control of the States that chartered the railroads—such as the right of way, the roadbed, the quality of the engines and cars, the employees and officials of the railroad—except to require that they shall be safe and convenient and open to the use of all classes of people and freights in a reasonable way and to a reasonable extent, which can be effectively accomplished through a system of inspections and fines.

Interstate transporters of commerce, which is the class we are trying to deal with as common carriers, are not interstate commerce, nor are the railroad properties interstate commerce. It is only their dealings in the transportation of interstate commerce that Congress has the power to regulate. This is, in the legal sense, a narrow field of jurisdiction, and can be fully controlled by Congress without serious difficulty, at least as to the principles on which such control can be rightfully exercised. As to vicious practices by the transporters of interstate passengers and freights, Congress has the clear right to define and punish them as crimes, and can recite in the law the state of facts that create a legal presumption of guilt on the part of the accused.

The most important questions that Congress may rightfully deal with, in its legislation to control railroads engaged in interstate transportation, are freight and passenger rates of transportation, and the abuses they may inflict upon interstate commerce by the various practices they impose upon it, to the detriment of the people, in granting advantages to favored persons and places which, of course, are to be paid for.

In both aspects, the subject is of vital consequence to the country. In considering the magnitude of this evil condition, the necessity for its control, and the true ground upon which Congress should base its legislation for the relief of the people and the security of the freedom of their commerce, it is indispensable that we should trace to its source this power to do evil and wrong to the people and to endanger the general welfare.

Unquestionably, the real source of these crying evils and wrongs to the people is the abuse of the powers of railroad corporations created by the States, by men and corporations that are chiefly foreign to such States.

Acting separately, and within the powers granted them by the States creating them, the railroad companies could not inflict any great and permanent harm upon the interstate commerce of the people.

The absence of their employment in transporting commerce among the States, on through routes, would have greatly retarded our commercial growth and strength; and, to drive them out from that employment would now inflict hardship and distress upon the whole country. But the resulting injury to the States that created the railroad corporations would assure very conservative action on the part of the States. They would enlarge the powers of their corporations to meet such occasions. Yet Congress has not the power to compel these railroads to remain in the business of through-line transportation, which is only a matter of agreement between the railroad companies, nor has Congress the power to compel their continued operation within the States that created them. Congress can not do this, as the States can, by putting them in the hands of receivers. The railroads can go out of business, or be put out of business by the States that created them, in despite of all that Congress can do to prevent such a calamity.

There is no way known to the law by which any person or corporation can be forced to conduct business as a common carrier or as a private carrier, unless it may be a railroad company chartered by a State, and, if such power exists as to such a company, only the State that created it can enforce such an order against it.

Congress may destroy interstate transportation by rail through hostile legislation, but in doing this it would at least violate the spirit of the Constitution, which authorizes Congress to regulate commerce among the States, but by no means to prevent or destroy it.

Thus confined in its power over commerce, Congress is very helpless in the effort to regulate transportation by State railroads through coercion or compulsion. The railroads, however, have grown in such authority over interstate commerce that their influence and their real power amounts to duress upon the freedom of commerce. They can disturb and in many cases they can prevent commerce between distant points through their power to refuse to transport passengers or productions except upon such terms as to freight rates and as to other matters as they choose to impose. These terms and conditions amount to duress, and violate the freedom of commerce they were created to sustain.

It is this power of compelling the people to submit to injustice, under duress, that Congress is endeavoring to control or suppress. The States can suppress this evil power, or control it, by requiring the railroads chartered by them to conform their rates of charges and all their practices as transporters of interstate commerce to the standard of regulation and control that Congress may adopt; and they would cheerfully do this and punish their railroad corporations for refusing compliance, by a forfeiture of their charters, rather than distress their own people by embarrassing interstate commerce. No problem of trade is more remote from realization than this.

The powers of the States will come to the rescue of the commerce of the country at large by controlling their railroad companies, even while Congress is engaged in the effort to destroy their sovereign rights by enacting laws to confer arbitrary power upon a national railroad commission and in sheltering them from review and correction by the courts.

Already more than half the States have conferred authority upon their railroad corporations to make agreements with the corporations of other States for establishing through lines of transportation, and it is this consent of the States alone that makes such agreements lawful. Without the consent of the States that created them, such agreements would be of no legal validity.

The other links in the combinations that comprise through lines of transportation are either wanting or they are supplied through the ownership of a majority of the stock of the weaker companies by the greater railroad companies which, in the end, control all the companies in great through lines. Just at this point the greatest danger to the country arises from the power of concentrated capital.

Any railroad company a majority of whose stock is owned by another railroad company in a different State, or by a great capitalist, can be forced into any interstate transportation agreement without the consent of the legislature that created it through the power of its stock held by a foreign corporation or by a foreign capitalist and voted in its stockholders' meetings. This can not be prevented except by the action of the States that created these emasculated railroad companies, forbidding such overlordship. Congress can, if it chooses, prohibit railroad corporations that own the stock or the bonds of other corporations from establishing through lines or routes of transportation by agreement with them. But such legislation would probably be too severe on the capitalists, and there is little hope that it will ever be enacted by Congress.

This bill contains no such corrective legislation. It does not permit the national railroad commission to inquire into such abuses. In this respect this measure is quite indulgent to the favorite wickedness of the reprobates whose evil practices it professes to correct for the safety of the people.

As the condition is to-day, we are searching for power to control railroads engaged in the transportation among or between the States, and are removing constitutional barriers to our progress by tearing them out of the existing laws and kicking them out of the legislative chambers bodily. We find our powers still further barricaded by the fact that Congress can not repeal or modify the charters of the railroad corporations created by the States. We are compelled to use the agreements of those corporations to support the legislation in the measure now before the Senate, and yet they can create a dead bar and obstruction to our further progress at any time by dissolving their agreements with other railroad companies to carry on the business of transportation beyond the limits of the States that created them. Indeed, it may be safely assumed that few, if any, of these agreements are obligatory on the companies that made them for the want of the legislative consent of the States that chartered them.

It is upon this uncertain base that Congress, in this measure, is advised to exercise the wide, indefinite, and extremely doubtful power of exercising legislative control over all State railroad companies that engage in the interstate transportation of commerce. If any such corporation should for any cause refuse to engage in such transaction, there is no Federal power that can compel it to continue in the business. It is probably the consciousness of this difficulty that has led to the insertion in the bill reported by the committee of the provision in the lines 17 to 25, inclusive, on page 11 of the bill, as follows:

> The Commission may also, after hearing on a complaint, establish through routes and joint rates as the maximum to be charged and prescribe the division of such rates, as hereinbefore provided, and the terms and conditions under which such through routes shall be operated, when that may be necessary to give effect to any provision of this act and the carriers complained of have refused or neglected to voluntarily establish such through routes and joint rates, provided no reasonable or satisfactory through routes exist.

The language of this proposed enactment is quite broad enough to empower the Commission to construct through railroads to connect with other railroads, for the establishment of through routes of transportation where no reasonable or satisfactory through routes exist, or where such routes exist and "the carriers complained of have refused or neglected to voluntarily establish such through routes and joint rates."

If the power to regulate commerce among the States includes the power to build railroads within the States by act of Congress in order to establish through routes for the transportation of interstate commerce, this legislation has a constitutional foundation upon which it can be rested. Otherwise it is a new departure that dislocates all our ideas of the rightful powers of Congress, and will in the end wreck the entire plan of the Federal Government as being supplied by the Constitution only with delegated and limited powers.

If this clause, as it is written in this bill, is enacted into a law, no further or other limit can be placed upon the power of Congress to construct and to own and conduct every railroad in the United States as a vehicle of commerce among the States.

This feature of this measure is a distinct advance in the plan of government ownership of all railroads, and is the first practical demonstration of that fatal heresy that Congress has yet made in actual legislation.

If this broad provision shall be so construed as to apply to railroads existing in the States now or hereafter, and to empower the national railroad commission to set aside traffic agreements between the railroad companies of different States for through transportation of commerce, which agreements are not denounced in this bill as being unlawful, or if it is so construed as to establish through routes and joint rates between railroads where no such agreements exist, where the carriers of interstate commerce have refused or neglected to voluntarily establish such through routes and joint rates over their connecting roads, this provision gives to Congress the power to establish such agreements by law, or else to substitute its will for the right to make such agreements, and to compel obedience to it by heavy penal enactments against the alleged delinquents. It gives to the government-ownership party the full sanction of Congress for all they claim. It does not compel the States to sell their railroads to the United States, nor can that measure of success ever reward their efforts to destroy the Constitution of the United States. If this bill becomes a law in its present shape, those who are decrying the rights of the States will thank God for their firm seat in the Constitution of the country.

The effect is that the railroads are to be compelled to enter into agreements which the States that created them have refused to empower them to make, or failing to do so, are to be subjected to heavy penalties.

This view of this enactment condemns it as a flagrant violation of the Constitution of the United States. But it is in line with other provisions of this bill, all of which are predicated on the false assumption of power in Congress to control railroad corporations chartered by the States, by the vis major, and to the same extent as the States can control them when they engage in agreements with other railroads or navigation lines in the transportation of interstate commerce with the consent of the States that created them, or without such consent.

Using the text of the bill above quoted as illustrations of the false premises on which this measure is based, I will state my views and convictions in an effort, however vain it may be, to convince the Senate of the fatal mistake that was made in 1887 in laying the foundations of our present plan for regulating commerce among the States by the control of State railroads engaged in the transportation of such commerce.

The plan of 1887, which this bill is intended to enforce with drastic provisions, is far better than the present measure. In that plan the powers of the courts were invoked for the purpose of getting the aid of the judicial power to enforce all the important rulings of the Commission. In this effort there has been only a scant success. But scant success is better than a desperate effort to break down all constitutional barriers to a coveted triumph of might over right.

In the plan before the Senate the purpose is to transfer the judicial power into the hands of the national railroad commission, so that their rulings will at once have the sanction and authority of the judicial and legislative powers of the Government and the aid of its executive powers in the enforcement of its decrees. These features of this bill have necessarily met with the opposition—learned, able, and resolute—of great lawyers who have participated in the debate to defend the distribution of the powers of government among the Departments in pursuance of the Constitution. But neither measure presents the true issue, which is the right of Congress, in regulating interstate transportation of commerce, to prescribe the terms and conditions under which they are to be permitted to enjoy that privilege. A grant of such privilege and the definition of the terms on which it may be used is the necessary predicate for its control and for laws to punish its abuse. Until Congress has enacted a law to declare the policy of the United States as to the transporters of interstate commerce by State railroads, it is premature, unjust, and unlawful to punish them for exercising privileges that are lawful, which have been granted them by the laws of the States that created them.

Such a declaration by Congress is the necessary predicate of such regulation and punishment, because such transportation of commerce is lawful, as a part of the freedom of commerce, and the regulation of it by Congress is a restraint upon the freedom of commerce. Congress has the right to place just restraints upon the freedom of commerce to prevent abuses, but it has no right or power to compel those engaged in transportation to continue in the business. The writ of mandamus provided for in this bill will fail utterly to compel such service to the public. Conducting a business that is lawful can not be converted in a criminal pursuit until its unlawfulness is declared by statute, and such statutes can not be retroactive.

The power over carriers who transport interstate commerce depends largely, if not entirely, upon its rightful control of the routes of transportation.

If the route is dedicated to the service of the public, whether by law or with the consent of the owner, so that the use of the route ceases to be private property and becomes public property as to the free right of the people to use it for travel and transportation, such dedication places such route or highway within the power of the proper government for its control, preservation, improvement, protection, and for the regulation of its service of the public. How far any government may go in fixing the rates of compensation of common carriers transporting commerce for hire over such highways is not necessary to be considered in connection with the point I am trying to elucidate, which is that the dedication of the highway to public use by some lawful authority is the actual foundation of the right of the government to fix the rate charges that are prescribed to the carrier by statute.

If the route is private property, not dedicated to the service of all comers without reservation, the owner may use it at his will and on his own terms for the transportation of persons or their property, and no government can fix his charges, although the privilege he grants of traveling through his grounds or on his private road on payment of a fare is extended to all comers.

It is the private ownership of the route that excludes the Government from jurisdiction to regulate the rates of transportation over it without the consent of the owner. This distinction is obvious, in the power that Congress exercises over navigable waters within the limits of the United States, which are dedicated by our laws to the equal and free use of all the citizens of the United States.

There is no important particular relating to the rights and duties of the navigators of our waters, exterior or interior, and their vessels, machinery, equipment, outfit, and all else that pertains to navigation, transportation, or to cargoes and passengers that is not carefully provided for in our statutes by regulation and by fines, penalties, and forfeitures that includue owners, officers, and all employees, and all the property that is so used in the service of the public.

The only thing that is not provided for or regulated is the rates that these common carriers may charge for freights and passage. These are left to the mighty power of competition and the irresistible judgment of the courts of conscience, in which the Constitution requires that juries shall sit to represent the majesty of the people, who are the sovereign source of all laws and the final arbiter of all controversies.

All rates on water courses are left where all the laws leave them, to be controlled by competition, and if courts pass upon them, by the reasonableness of the rates.

Two grand competing lines of transportation in the United States perfectly illustrate the difference between highways that are dedicated to the use of the people of the United States by national law and highways that are dedicated to the use of the people of the respective States under the laws that create railroad corporations.

The Mississippi River, from its head of navigation to New Orleans and out to the Gulf of Mexico, is a route dedicated to national uses by the organic law. The strongly competitive route of railroad transportation from Boston to Galveston is not so dedicated to commerce among the States. If there is any part of this railroad route that is thus dedicated to national use or service it has not been done by national law, but it exists, if at all, by the agreements of State railroads with each other, and possibly, in some cases, by the tacit or express consent of the States that created them. If no such consent has been given, these agreements are all ultra vires and void. The States can repudiate them or confirm them at pleasure, but if the States are not bound to these agreements, they are a rope of sand.

On this railroad route are fifteen States, all having State railroad commissions that are organized under the provisions of State constitutions or laws and, in almost every case, under State constitutions. Besides these States, this great line of interstate transportation passes through the District of Columbia, with the consent of Congress, and without dedication by act of Congress to the use and service of the people of the United States, as routes of interstate commerce.

Does it not appear from these facts and conditions that Congress and these fifteen States have to make some dedication of these through routes to the use of the people of the United States before Congress can control them as it controls the navigation of the Mississippi River? Will any man be so bold as to say that the same power exists in Congress to control these State railroads, that own their own roadbeds and all their equipment under State charters, and the Mississippi River, the right of navigation on which belongs alike to all the people of the United States? Or will any be so reckless as to attempt to place the ownership of these railroads in the absolute control of Congress, or in the common ownership of the people, by a mere enactment of Congress and without due process of law?

No discussion is needed to show this fatal error, and I trust that the advocates of such a movement will not consider it offensive if I should say that no rational discussion is possible in respect of a proposition that is so manifestly absurd.

In this measure Congress is asked to declare that it now has as clear and as extensive power to legislate for the control of these interstate transporters of commerce over railroads, that are private property, as it has over the navigation of the Mississippi River, and as clear a right to compel obedience to its mandates. It has no such power and can not have it until the railroads, by hereafter engaging in transportation over continuous lines through the States, with the permission of Congress, have dedicated or submitted their lines to the control of Congress. It is like the case of a man engaging, as a partisan, in fighting in a war for the flag of his country. It matters not that he fights on fields of battle with the consent of the commander of the forces, he is not a soldier and is not subject to military duty or discipline until he has enlisted in the army or has been forced in by conscription.

The purpose of this bill is to force the State railroads and the States that created them into subordination to the power and will of Congress by a process of conscription or condemnation to public service because they are voluntarily engaged in transporting interstate commerce. This can not be done by compulsion of law. They own their railroad lines, roadbeds, equipments, and charters, and these can not be taken or condemned by Congress to the public use of the people of the United States except by due process of law and upon making just compensation to them. What is the due process of law for such condemnation? It is simply the enactment of a law that after a fixed date any railroad that engages in interstate commerce, or in conducting interstate commerce, as in the case of the West Virginia coal roads operated by the owners of coal mines, shall be considered, regarded, and dealt with by Congress as if it had voluntarily dedicated its property to the use of the people of the United States as a public highway for that purpose and to every necessary extent to make the dedication effectual for the proper service of the public at large.

After such an enactment by Congress the railroads can enlist in the service of the country voluntarily, if they choose, or they can be forced to retire from the field of interstate transportation of commerce. Possibly after such an enactment by Congress the right to regard them as entering voluntarily into this line of business would become absolute and irrevocable, both as to railroad companies and to the States that created them, if they continue in the business. The act of conducting such transportation, after Congress has prescribed regulations for its conduct, will be consentive, not in invitum; and the distinction between such acts, as to the legislative power to control or punish them, is plain, and it is the criterion of the powers of government in changing methods of public service that are lawful and of common right into conditions that are forbidden. Where the existing right is made unlawful except under certain conditions it is the refusal to comply with the new conditions that gives to the Government the power to punish or to control by the exercise of the vis major—the power to compel obedience.

But the consideration of this question will in the end become unnecessary by reason of the state of facts that I will now present, which assure the harmonious action and cooperation of the Government of the United States and of the railroads and of the States that created them.

In presenting the facts on which I rely to support this very desirable situation, I will assume that the fifteen States that are spanned by connecting railroads between Boston and Galveston will earnestly desire that the railroads should maintain through routes of connections, so that cars loaded with freight at Boston can pass to Galveston without the delay of reloading them at each State line. That and many other like advantages as to passengers and freight would create a demand for the maintenance of such through routes that no State will willingly neglect. I need not speak of the advantages of such railway routes. I could not exaggerate them if I should attempt to do so, at least in the estimation of the people as to their value and importance.

Equally reluctant to yield the benefits of the security afforded by such employment of capital in the handling of the profits and other incidents of the control of long lines of transportation through fifteen of the richest States in the world, the few men who actually control these highways would long hesitate to yield the advantages of so great an investment. All the stockholders and the bondholders of the railroads would also be equally reluctant to part with the security for their investments in the capital stock and credit of these long lines of transportation.

It is impossible to lay down on the map of the world any long line of railroad that is so certain to yield a profit to investors or that will afford a greater prospect of future value in its manipulation. If it yielded only 3 per cent on the actual capital invested, the stock of nearly every railroad in such through route would be equal to the 3 per cent bonds of the United States, as a security for the investment of money in large sums. So that the States and the stockholders concerned in such connected lines are in harmony as to their continued operation, but, for reasons that become inharmonious, after the line of reasonable charges for freights is transcended, their interests become divergent.

This bill secures to the railroads, by the pledge of all the power of the Government, a remunerative income from freight and passenger receipts, upon the stocks of the company, at their face value, without regard to the actual cost or value of the investment in railroad property. At this point, and at the point of the reasonableness of the rates prescribed by a national railroad commission, and at the point of the right of trial by jury, of the reasonableness of the rates charged by the railroads, or by the national railroad commission, the interests of the stockholders of interstate lines diverge from and become hostile to the interests of the people of the States that chartered the railroads.

The people of the States that created these railroads will refuse to dedicate them to the general use of all the people of the United States, and to the control of Congress, in respect of interstate transportation, except upon terms that are just to them. They will refuse to contribute to the wealth of holding companies and monopolies at the expense of justice to themselves.

The States have all the necessary powers in their own hands to control the watering of stock and the monopolistic powers of holding companies. To prevent its own corporations from doing injustice to the country a State can impose legal restraints upon them that will hold them strictly, in their conduct to the demands of public justice.

The United States can not control the railroads in such matters, because they have no proprietorship in them. The States can control them, because they have such proprietorship, even to the extent of destroying their franchises and working their dissolution.

Neither the railroad corporations nor the power of the States over them can be dispensed with in holding them to the performance of the duty of transporting interstate commerce. When the corporations decline to perform such duty, the State having authorized and empowered them to do so, they are amenable to the forfeiture of their franchises by the action of the State that created them. This power to forfeit and destroy the charter rights and powers of these corporations can never be transferred to the United States except by purchase or condemnation.

I am not essaying to work out or to define these powers of the States and the railroad companies, but only to present certain features that show the interdependence of the corporations, and the States, and the Congress, in making compulsory the dedication of the railroad to the use of the public and to the control of Congress, in the transportation of interstate commerce. These powers, thus cooperating, furnish all the power that is needed and make its harmonious action perfectly assured, if Congress will deal justly with the subject and will cease to be arrogant in asserting powers that it can not constitutionally maintain.

The motives that control the owners of the railroads and the State governments are those of great profit and advantage, and it is strong enough to hold them to the general public service under all circumstances and conditions. They will never relinquish these advantages, even under the strictest regimen of control by Congress.

The reason that should influence Congress in adopting the logical and legal plan of excluding the railroads from transporting interstate commerce unless they comply with such terms and conditions as Congress shall impose is that the dedication of the railroads to general public uses for such transportation is voluntary, and the acceptance of the conditions should be voluntary. There should be no compulsory legislation, based upon assertions of powers that are denied and bitterly controverted, when a better result can be reached through powers that all admit and measures that are just.

After such acceptance, whether it is tacit or express, there is an end to questions as to the constitutional power of Congress to create a railroad commission, and as to whether the rates it shall prescribe are the exercise of legislative, judicial, or administrative acts, and whether they operate in present or in future, and are subject to injunction or revision by the courts. The acceptance of the terms of the act of Congress by entering into a business from which they are otherwise excluded concludes every question except the constitutionality of the law in which such conditions are prescribed or the abuse by the railroad commission of the act empowering them to fix rates of transportation.

The constitutionality of the act and the reasonableness of the freight rates imposed by the railroad commission are questions that no court can be prevented from considering and deciding when it has jurisdiction of any suit in which they arise. Equally true it is that any court that has such judicial power, derived from the Constitution, can not be limited in its plenary exercise. All such controversies disappear, under a statute that permits railroads to do business as carriers or transporters of interstate commerce, upon the conditions prescribed in the act. Such conditions are imposed upon every official and every person who engages in Government employment or who accepts a license or privilege from the Government.

Especially is this true when the subject-matter of the privilege granted is exclusively within the power and subject to the control of the Government or is granted in consideration of a service which is to be rendered to the public.

Conceding that the transportation of goods for hire by a common carrier is commerce, within the meaning of the Constitution, as it is assumed to be in this bill, but which I do not believe, there can be no doubt that the regulation of that vocation or business is within the exclusive power of Congress, qualified only by such rights of common carriers as no legislature and no court can refuse to recognize. Under such powers, Congress can permit or prohibit the transportation of interstate commerce except upon such conditions as it may choose to impose, within the limits of the duty of regulation; but Congress can not use that power to destroy commerce or to hamper it with destructive conditions or to embarrass it with unjust discriminations against a State or any locality, such as making differentials in rates, or other conditions, based upon the final and exclusive judgment of a railroad commission.

Under the guidance of wisdom that seems to have been divinely inspired, and is our American conception, our Constitution provides that, in such cases, a State that complains of such injustice can be heard in the Supreme Court of the United States, exercising its original jurisdiction, for the correction of any wrong or for the restraint of the national railroad commission that unjustly deals with its people, and Congress can enact no law that can in any manner affect its plenary power to do justice, or to regulate the hearing, or to interfere with the execution of its decrees.

This broad and unequaled grant of judicial power that resides in the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court has been overlooked by the great lawyers of the Senate in their masterly discussions of the appellate powers of the Supreme Court and the power of Congress to embarrass and limit its exercise in the matter of granting interlocutory injunctions.

That discussion, like the bill before the Senate, has had for its chief purpose the effort to clear away judicial obstructions to the unrestricted exercise of arbitrary and final authority of a national railroad commission in fixing rates for the transportation of interstate commerce, which demand is being resisted by other great lawyers with unflinching firmness.

That great discussion and the decision by Congress of the points thus presented will be in vain, as an answer to the complaint of a State on behalf of its railroad corporations or its people, made to the Supreme Court, in the exercise of its original jurisdiction. If the question has not been determined by Congress according to the right of the matter, that great court will annul the act in which the error is found.

Looking to this great council of state, discretion, and judgment, to which the Constitution has confided these powers, I have felt assured that in the outcome of all this great contention the powers of the States and their corporations and of Congress and the reviewing courts, if they are not banished from the arena, and the general welfare of the public will be made finally to work together for the good of the country by its unquestionable decrees.

In this proud faith, and in the sincere gratitude I have toward our fathers for creating the saving power of this great tribunal, I have listened without serious apprehension, but with painful interest, to our great lawyers who have investigated all the decisions of the Supreme Court as to its appellate jurisdiction.

If there was not left to us the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to which the country can appeal for safety, I would dread the consequences of these disputations when the settlement of them is left to the people at the ballot box, for which grand assize all this great contention in the Houses of Congress, led and guided by Cabinet and other counsels at the White House, is obviously intended as a preparation.

That great decree of the people, when it comes and is again expressed in Congress, will no more disturb the Supreme Court in its supreme original jurisdiction than Mount Sinai was disturbed by the thunders at its base when Moses delivered the twelve tables of the law to all the tribes of Israel.

The people will be glad of this final deliverance, and will thank God that our fathers were inspired with the wisdom to create this great tribunal for their safety and peace.

The true remedy for all the evils, existing and conjectured, in respect of the railroad situation as it is related to interstate commerce is an act of Congress that will impose conditions upon its transportation by railroads. It will be followed by all the courts as an adjustment of a complex legal and political situation that has arisen mainly from State legislation touching the business relations of their railroad corporations with the corporations of other States in an interval of time when Congress was making no adequate provision for the enormous growth of interstate commerce.

We are now aroused to a duty that has been neglected, and find that the field of exclusive jurisdiction that belongs to Congress is occupied by State corporations that have no right to control it by private agreement among themselves, authorized in some instances by acts of State legislatures all of which are ultra vires as against the rights of the United States.

The simple duty of Congress is to occupy that field and control it. This can be properly done by assuming the actual control and by prescribing the the terms upon which the State railroads shall hereafter continue to transport interstate commerce and to punish such as refuse compliance with the terms prescribed in the law.

I am not personally ambitious to frame such a statute. If I were I would find no occasion to go outside the language of this bill to find the terms and conditions which any State railroad should be compelled to accept as a part of the privilege it may hereafter enjoy of transporting interstate commerce. I would not adopt all the conditions of such acceptance that are attempted to be forced upon the railroads in this measure by the vis major that seems to be its reliance for the subjugation of State railroads and of the States that owe them the protection of law and of justice. Their purposes have not been evil, but the attractiveness of the great opportunities they have afforded capitalists have been seductive, and it has caused such abuses of their facilities of transportation to monopolists and holding companies that an indignant people rise against them and seek to destroy them.

I would deny to any railroad the privilege of interstate transportation whose stock is held, in a majority of its issue, by any railroad in another State or by any holding company.

The States would heartily indorse such a condition in the statute and would compel their railroad companies to conform to it, and would aid them by denying to stock so held all privilege of voting at meetings of stockholders. They might go further and declare that a nonresident stockholder should be ineligible to election or appointment as an officer or director of the company.

As to rates, rebates, and preferential allowances or discriminations, the conditions of the enactment found in this bill would be a safe guide that could not be questioned in any court, because the carrier is estopped from questioning them by continuing to transport interstate commerce under the permission of the act of Congress; except that, in the case of the denial of the constitutionality of the law or of the reasonableness of the rates he is compelled to accept or to pay, the carrier and the shipper alike should have free and unobstructed right to resort to the courts for redress.

I am only expressing in crude form some of the conditions I would vote to prescribe in such a law. I would not strain the powers of Congress nor cloud the powers given to a national railroad commission by attempting to make reformations in railroad rates by compulsion that can be more easily and justly made conditions of the law that the carrier can refuse to accept at the peril of going out of the business of transporting interstate commerce.

As to the injurious practices by railroads engaged in transporting interstate commerce, and domestic commerce as well, that are so justly complained of, the statute I suggest would furnish the lawful basis for their punishment.

One who accepts any public trust or public occupation for gain, under an act of Congress, may be indicted or informed against and punished for its abuse, and Congress can enact laws to enforce obedience to such an engagement.

Alabama stands pledged in her constitution and laws to prescribe rates of compensation to her railroads for all public service. I am ready to make good that pledge by my vote in the Senate, in relation to rates of compensation to be prescribed to railroad corporations engaged in the transportation of interstate commerce by act of Congress on like conditions.

But Alabama opens her courts to the judicial settlement of every complaint, by shipper or by railroad company, as to any rate that is unreasonable or oppressive. I must do my State the homage of following her lead in these solemn constitutional declarations, as to the debt of justice she owes to all who enter her courts with a plea for redress. I feel warranted in going further and in saying that Alabama has virtually accepted, for all her railroads that have connections or agreements with the railroads of other States, the right of such companies to regulate their rates of charges for the transportation of interstate commerce by agreement with each other. But she has not consented that Congress may change that agreement and yet hold her railroads to the duty of transporting interstate commerce, in virtue of its obligations, on such terms as Congress may choose to impose.

She will not, probably, consent that Congress shall impose rates upon her railroads that are unjust, or invidious, or discriminative, or that are affected with the destructive powers of differentials, that may ruin her great industries, even if she is thereby cut off from through lines of transportation. Alabama will not consent that a national railroad commission shall have power so to adjust rates of interstate transportation as to insure a remunerative compensation to railroads engaged in that trade, and to pay profits to watered stock or to stocks held by monopolistic holding companies, and I will not vote for any such scheme to enrich those who are already responsible for the injustice that her people are suffering. Alabama will not enact laws that will be necessary in the infliction of such wrongs to her people.

I do not wish or intend to concede to Congress the power to control her railroads by such enactments as Congress has the right to exercise over vessels that ply the navigable water courses of Alabama, or to add to those powers the right to fix rates of transportation upon her railroads, when it has never enacted a law to fix freight rates on vessels of any description.

This historical fact is a powerful plea for the unrestricted right of fair competition in the carrying trade, whether by sea or land.

All have been engaged in the effort to frame a law in which a jury trial is abrogated as to any issue involved in the subject of rate making that relates to the reasonableness of a rate, or to a discrimination or a preference in rates, or as to any other matter where the conscience of the people could possibly find expression through their representatives in the jury box.

Questions of the reasonableness of charges by common carriers, or reasonable diligence in the performance of duty by all hired servants and in all forms of bailments, and by all public servants, can not be taken away from the decision of courts in which juries are an indispensable part of judicial power without a gross violation of the Constitution. Yet this bill is carefully prepared so that this wrong to the people will become a necessary result of the enactment.

Judges sitting in equity are empowered exclusively by this bill to try all questions of the reasonableness of rates, and of other conduct of the State railroads, and of the national railroad commission, and the people's tribunal of a jury is excluded from participation in such trials. The forum conscientiæ—the great court of conscience—is the final arbiter of all controversies that arise in all civilized countries.

Jurors are the chancellors of the people, selected to judge equitably on all questions of the reasonableness of the acts and conduct of men who are placed by law or by contract in positions of trust and responsibility where it is necessary or proper that a person so intrusted has any liberty of discretionary judgment or action. Jurors in such cases are provided for the purpose of deciding upon the reasonableness of such acts, because they are supposed to have correct judgment as to the natural equities that should weigh in arriving at just verdicts.

In the United States the Constitution takes care of the courts of conscience by enthroning their powers in the jury box, and it is in that tribunal that the people find their security for just treatment in the courts.

There are fixed elements of competition afforded to the people in our physical and commercial geography that will correct, as far as such a thing is possible, the present evils in our situation, and such as may be reasonably expected to arise in future.

The navigation of our northern lakes and of our Atlantic, Mexican Gulf, and Pacific coasts form a vast quadrangle that is intersected by other navigable water courses at frequent intervals, and supplies water transportation that virtually controls the interchange of commerce to the distance of hundreds of miles of country lying contiguous to these coast lines. The competitive power of these lines of navigation and their affluent water courses in the control of the cost of transportation of commerce is far in excess of that of every railroad that exists or will ever be built in the United States. This power—all of it—belongs to the people at large, and its control is lodged in Congress, with none to dispute its jurisdiction.

This power is greatly increased by the water courses that flow to the east and to the south from the Appalachian range of mountains, and to the west from the Rocky Mountain ranges.

Each navigable stream is an important factor, in competition with railroad transportation, within the entire area of its watershed, while the aggregate is startling in its magnitude.

When we come to the central empire of production and commerce included in the watershed of the Mississippi River, we find there the supreme power of competition planted within this great inner quadrangle as a citadel of unassailable strength, adding its forces to the competitive power of the outer quadrangle of lake and ocean coasts I have described.

The Mississippi River, reaching from the northern to the southern line of our exterior quadrangle of coast waters, passes through the middle of it and extends this competitive transportation almost to the outer limits of its watershed in all directions, which includes 1,240,050 square miles. It contains thirty-eight rivers that are being improved by the Government as navigable water courses and have already a navigable length of 13,261 miles that run through or border upon thirteen great States in the center of the Union.

These lines of river transportation divide our part of this continent in the center and hold a broad and powerful control over transportation that is competitive with all the railroads. None of them can escape this competition.

The combined competition of our water courses must hold in check and must control railroad transportation forever beyond the power of all combinations of monopoly to make it dominant over the commerce of the United States.

Another great line of intercoastal navigable waters is making steady progress toward completion on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts. It is not too early to discern with certainty that this line will become a powerful competitor with the railroads that are nearly parallel with these coasts. On the Gulf coast, Texas is leading in this great enterprise.

Railroad domination is only a short-lived incident of our commercial expansion that must yield the supremacy to the superior and permanent control of water transportation.

The railroads, under a proper system of river improvement, will become largely contributors to the transportation lines of the water courses that belong to the people. The wheat and corn fields of the Central and Western States when they were virgin soil paralyzed the production of those food supplies in the older States until they ceased to be commercially profitable and they almost abandoned the effort of competition in the markets. The great grain-growing areas are rapidly becoming smaller by division among a larger land-holding population, and are being kept up to nearly the standard of their earlier productiveness by the better farming of smaller landholders. In the meantime the wheat and corn growers of the older States are again producing crops at a profit for domestic and foreign markets, and the value of their crops is steadily increasing. Cheaper transportation has much to do with this returning prosperity.

So it is with the competition between the railroads and the rivers. Great capitalists have been booming railroad investments until they are beginning to find that river transportation and transportation by sea is cutting down rates and profits. They have had their day of great prosperity, and the people are beginning to look for the improvement of the lines of competitive transportation that belong to them. The tide is turning, and the water courses are furnishing power to manufacture much of the commerce that they transport to distant markets.

If the empire State of Texas will hasten the work upon the intercoastal channel from Brownsville to Donaldsonville, that her people are so earnestly engaged in opening; and if Alabama, Mississippi, and Florida will extend that channel to Tampa Bay, from the Mississippi River, a steamboat that can navigate Trinity River can visit interior ports over a distance of 25,000 miles, beginning at Brownsville, on the Rio Grande.

If such conditions existed (and they are in easy reach with less cost than the litigation we are incubating in this hot debate about the mysterious forces of interlocuory injunctions) the rights and interests of the States in cooperation with Congress would soon dispose of our real troubles with the railroads.

In that happy day we will all forget that we ever dreaded the competition of the monopolistic power of interstate railroads, and the stern advocates of the alleged rights of the people will cease to shudder with fear that some court will enjoin a decree of the national railroad commission, until its constitutionality can be determined by a final hearing, or until the Supreme Court can pass upon the question.

Such water competition in transportation as the people of the Gulf and Atlantic coasts are engaged in preparing to compel the railroads to cease from troubling, will soon dispense with the necessity for all the anguish we are suffering about interlocutory injunctions.

Within the watershed of the Mississippi River the lines of transportation that belong to the people are worth millions as a permanent source of wealth and as facilities for transportation, where the railroad lines are worth only thousands of dollars.

If Congress will do its duty even in a parsimonious way in the improvement of our water courses under scientific direction and practical methods, and will place river and harbor bills on a footing with post-office bills and Army and Navy bills as standing orders for the public service, the people will soon be snapping their fingers in the faces of the railroad monopolists as to their control over their industries, and Congress will be as reluctant to fix prices on the carriage of commerce by rail and water as it has been since the Constitution was ordained to fix prices on transportation by water, and peaceful competition will restore honesty and justice to their rightful authority.

If the money that has been spent and will be spent in the effort to control the railroads by legislation, under powers that are strenuously controverted and are at least doubtful, had been and should be applied or could be applied hereafter to the improvement of our navigation, the railroads would cease to do evil and would learn to do good.

I freely and regretfully admit that evils of great magnitude and of deplorable consequences exist in the monopolistic abuses of the rights and duties of railroad corporations that the States have created and have failed to properly control, and I am anxious to exercise all the powers of Congress in controlling and punishing the malefactors. But I am unwilling to have this duty embarrassed with protracted litigation, which a simple change in the attitude of Congress would readily prevent; and I revolt at the thought of making these wrongs a pretext for setting aside the courts and the Constitution, in order to hand this contest over to the manipulators of political campaigns, or to the keeping and control of those who are the enemies of the system of just protection to life, liberty, and property that our Constitution embodies, that our laws respect, and is the noble foundation on which our national reputation is built.

Truth, justice, obedience to law, patience in growth, and faith in our future, based upon the belief that a nation is blessed whose God is the Lord, will become the final and happy revelation of our splendid destiny.

I look for the best results when the States and the Federal Government, freed from jealousies, are recognized by all classes and sections as coworkers for the general welfare, and I know that their earnest cooperation is the true key that will unlock the tangle that this bill is about to make permanent and dangerous, if not destructive, to the welfare of the country.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 10, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate April 9, 1906.

DISTRICT JUDGES.

Robert E. Lewis, of Colorado, to be United States district judge, district of Colorado, vice Moses Hallett, resigned.

Alfred S. Moore, of Pennsylvania, to be United States district judge, division No. 2, district of Alaska. A reappointment, his term expiring May 26, 1906.

MARSHAL.

William H. Darrough, of Indian Territory, to be United States marshal for the northern district of Indian Territory. A reappointment, his term expiring June 30, 1906.

RECEIVER OF PUBLIC MONEYS.

Harvey J. Ellis, of Alliance, Nebr., to be receiver of public moneys at Alliance, Nebr., vice William R. Akers, whose term will expire April 10, 1906.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

Lieut. Col. Leven C. Allen, Sixteenth Infantry, to be colonel from April 5, 1906, vice Bubb, Twelfth Infantry, appointed brigadier-general.

Maj. Richard H. Wilson, Eighth Infantry, to be lieutenant-colonel from April 5, 1906, vice Allen, Sixteenth Infantry, promoted.

Capt. James A. Goodin, Seventh Infantry, to be major from April 5, 1906, vice Wilson, Eighth Infantry, promoted.

First Lieut. James B. Allison, Seventh Infantry, to be captain from April 5, 1906, vice Goodin, Seventh Infantry, promoted.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

Lieut. Harley H. Christy to be a lieutenant-commander in the Navy from the 1st day of January, 1906, to fill a vacancy created in that grade by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1903.

Lieut. Noble E. Irwin to be a lieutenant-commander in the Navy from the 1st day of January, 1906, to fill a vacancy existing in that grade created by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1903.

Gunner Robert E. Simonson to be a chief gunner in the Navy from the 10th day of March, 1906, upon the completion of six years' service, in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1899, as amended by the act of Congress approved April 27, 1904.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE NAVY.

Russel H. Davis, a citizen of Minnesota, to be a second lieutenant in the Marine Corps from the 14th day of March, 1906, to fill a vacancy existing in that grade on that date.

Midshipman Walter A. Smead to be an ensign in the Navy from the 2d day of February, 1906, to fill a vacancy existing in that grade on that date.

POSTMASTERS.

ALABAMA.

John A. Bingham to be postmaster at Talladega, in the county of Talladega and State of Alabama, in place of John A. Bingham. Incumbent's commission expired March 14, 1906.

William Joseph Leppert to be postmaster at Camden, in the county of Wilcox and State of Alabama. Office became Presidential January 1, 1906.

Margaret Miller to be postmaster at Tuscaloosa, in the county of Tuscaloosa and State of Alabama, in place of Margaret Miller. Incumbent's commission expired April 1, 1906.

Daniel V. Sevier, jr., to be postmaster at Russellville, in the county of Franklin and State of Alabama, in place of Daniel V. Sevier, jr. Incumbent's commission expired January 21, 1906.

Walter W. Simmons to be postmaster at Athens, in the county of Limestone and State of Alabama, in place of Seborn E. York. Incumbent's commission expired March 14, 1906.

CALIFORNIA.

Leander H. Miner to be postmaster at Ferndale, in the county of Humboldt and State of California, in place of Leander H. Miner. Incumbent's commission expires June 10, 1906.

COLORADO.

Oscar Allert to be postmaster at Louisville, in the county of Boulder and State of Colorado. Office became Presidential April 1, 1906.

CONNECTICUT.

George W. Buteau to be postmaster at Baltic, in the county of New London and State of Connecticut. Office became Presidential January 1, 1906.

William P. Leete to be postmaster at North Haven, in the county of New Haven and State of Connecticut, in place of William P. Leete. Incumbent's commission expires June 24, 1906.

FLORIDA.

Thomas W. Lundy to be postmaster at Perry, in the county of Taylor and State of Florida. Office became Presidential April 1, 1906.

ILLINOIS.

John Haig to be postmaster at Le Roy, in the county of McLean and State of Illinois, in place of John Haig. Incumbent's commission expires June 10, 1906.

Mark L. Harper to be postmaster at Eureka, in the county of Woodford and State of Illinois, in place of Mark L. Harper. Incumbent's commission expires June 30, 1906.

W. H. Mix to be postmaster at Byron, in the county of Ogle and State of Illinois, in place of Joseph Hunt, deceased.

INDIANA.

Bennett M. Grove to be postmaster at Liberty, in the county of Union and State of Indiana, in place of Bennett M. Grove. Incumbent's commission expires June 28, 1906.

IOWA.

William B. Arbuckle to be postmaster at Villisca, in the county of Montgomery and State of Iowa, in place of William B. Arbuckle. Incumbent's commission expires June 10, 1906.

KANSAS.

William Smith to be postmaster at Galena, in the county of Cherokee and State of Kansas, in place of William Smith. Incumbent's commission expires May 8, 1906.

KENTUCKY.

William H. Overby to be postmaster at Henderson, in the county of Henderson and State of Kentucky, in place of Andrew J. Worsham. Incumbent's commission expired March 13, 1906.

Robert R. Perry to be postmaster at Winchester, in the county of Clark and State of Kentucky, in place of Robert R. Perry. Incumbent's commission expired March 13, 1906.

Frank W. Stith to be postmaster at Latonia, in the county of Kenton and State of Kentucky. Office became Presidential April 1, 1906.

Frederick A. Van Rensselaer to be postmaster at Owensboro, in the county of Daviess and State of Kentucky, in place of Frederick A. Van Rensselaer. Incumbent's commission expired March 13, 1906.

MARYLAND.

George M. Evans to be postmaster at Elkton, in the county of Cecil and State of Maryland, in place of William J. Smith. Incumbent's commission expires May 2, 1906.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Arthur Bliss to be postmaster at Andover, in the county of Essex and State of Massachusetts, in place of Arthur Bliss. Incumbent's commission expired March 1, 1906.

MICHIGAN.

Frank P. Dunwell to be postmaster at Ludington, in the county of Mason and State of Michigan, in place of William G. Hudson. Incumbent's commission expired March 5, 1906.

John W. Fitzgerald to be postmaster at Grand Ledge, in the county of Eaton and State of Michigan, in place of John W. Fitzgerald. Incumbent's commission expires May 21, 1906.

Calvin A. Palmer to be postmaster at Manistee, in the county of Manistee and State of Michigan, in place of Calvin A. Palmer. Incumbent's commission expired March 5, 1906.

Lester B. Place to be postmaster at Three Rivers, in the county of St. Joseph and State of Michigan, in place of Frank B. Watson. Incumbent's commission expires May 19, 1906.

Henry C. Minnie to be postmaster at Eaton Rapids, in the county of Eaton and State of Michigan, in place of Henry C. Minnie. Incumbent's commission expires May 9, 1906.

Kenneth E. Struble to be postmaster at Shepherd, in the county of Isabella and State of Michigan, in place of Kenneth E. Struble. Incumbent's commission expires June 30, 1906.

James A. Trotter to be postmaster at Vassar, in the county of Tuscola and State of Michigan, in place of James A. Trotter. Incumbent's commission expires June 19, 1906.

James H. Williams to be postmaster at Whitehall, in the county of Muskegon and State of Michigan, in place of James H. Williams. Incumbent's commission expires June 6, 1906.

David E. Wilson to be postmaster at Belding, in the county of Ionia and State of Michigan, in place of David E. Wilson. Incumbent's commission expires June 25, 1906.

MISSOURI.

Robert D. Cramer to be postmaster at Memphis, in the county of Scotland and State of Missouri, in place of Robert D. Cramer. Incumbent's commission expires April 10, 1906.

Henry Grass to be postmaster at Hermann, in the county of Gasconade and State of Missouri, in place of Henry Grass. Incumbent's commission expires April 10, 1906.

NEBRASKA.

Henry C. Booker to be postmaster at Gothenburg, in the county of Dawson and State of Nebraska, in place of Henry C. Booker. Incumbent's commission expired February 10, 1906.

Horace M. Wells to be postmaster at Crete, in the county of Saline and State of Nebraska, in place of Horace M. Wells. Incumbent's commission expires April 10, 1906.

NEVADA.

Henry J. Jones to be postmaster at Elko, in the county of Elko and State of Nevada, in place of Henry J. Jones. Incumbent's commission expires June 30, 1906.

NEW MEXICO.

Lucius E. Kittrell to be postmaster at Socorro, in the county of Socorro and Territory of New Mexico, in place of Lucius E. Kittrell. Incumbent's commission expires June 25, 1906.

NEW YORK.

Edgar S. Clock to be postmaster at Islip, in the county of Suffolk and State of New York, in place of Edgar S. Clock. Incumbent's commission expires June 10, 1906.

Fred Dakin to be postmaster at Millerton, in the county of Dutchess and State of New York, in place of Thomas Dye, resigned.

Walter C. Dolson to be postmaster at Kingston, in the county of Ulster and State of New York, in place of Walter C. Dolson. Incumbent's commission expires May 14, 1906.

Samuel D. Mulholland to be postmaster at Port Henry, in the county of Essex and State of New York, in place of Samuel D. Mulholland. Incumbent's commission expires June 24, 1906.

Lewis C. O'Connor to be postmaster at Geneseo, in the county of Livingston and State of New York, in place of Lewis C. O'Connor. Incumbent's commission expires May 27, 1906.

Henry Riley to be postmaster at Cornwall, in the county of Orange and State of New York, in place of Henry Riley. Incumbent's commission expires April 30, 1906.

Fred A. Wright to be postmaster at Glen Cove, in the county of Nassau and State of New York, in place of Fred A. Wright. Incumbent's commission expired April 1, 1906.

OHIO.

Thomas J. Davies to be postmaster at Barberton, in the county of Summit and State of Ohio, in place of Thomas J. Davies. Incumbent's commission expires April 25, 1906.

Robert S. Fulton to be postmaster at Germantown, in the county of Montgomery and State of Ohio, in place of Robert S. Fulton. Incumbent's commission expires June 9, 1906.

Willis C. Kohler to be postmaster at Kenton, in the county of Hardin and State of Ohio, in place of John L. Clark. Incumbent's commission expires June 30, 1906.

J. W. Orr to be postmaster at Piqua, in the county of Miami and State of Ohio, in place of John W. Morris. Incumbent's commission expires June 9, 1906.

James T. Pickering to be postmaster at Lancaster, in the county of Fairfield and State of Ohio, in place of James T. Pickering. Incumbent's commission expires June 24, 1906.

Ansel T. Simmons to be postmaster at Geneva, in the county of Ashtabula and State of Ohio, in place of Ansel T. Simmons. Incumbent's commission expires May 16, 1906.

OREGON.

Squire Farrar to be postmaster at Salem, in the county of Marion and State of Oregon, in place of Edward Hirsch. Incumbent's commission expires June 30, 1906.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Asa S. Beers to be postmaster at Bath, in the county of Northampton and State of Pennsylvania. Office became Presidential April 1, 1906.

Byron A. Weaver to be postmaster at Montoursville, in the county of Lycoming and State of Pennsylvania, in place of Byron A. Weaver. Incumbent's commission expired February 7, 1906.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

Henry S. Williams to be postmaster at Aberdeen, in the county of Brown and State of South Dakota, in place of Henry S. Williams. Incumbent's commission expired April 1, 1906.

TEXAS.

D. C. Bellows to be postmaster at Seymour, in the county of Baylor and State of Texas, in place of Jay M. Musser, resigned.

William Pilley to be postmaster at Wills Point, in the county of Van Zandt and State of Texas, in place of William Pilley. Incumbent's commission expires April 30, 1906.

George C. Ross to be postmaster at Wortham, in the county of Freestone and State of Texas. Office became Presidential January 1, 1906.

Henry L. Somerville to be postmaster at Richmond, in the county of Fort Bend and State of Texas, in place of Henry L. Somerville. Incumbent's commission expires April 30, 1906.

VERMONT.

Carlos C. Bancroft to be postmaster at Montpelier, in the county of Washington and State of Vermont, in place of Carlos C. Bancroft. Incumbent's commission expires June 30, 1906.

Minnie A. Benton to be postmaster at Saxtons River, in the county of Windham and State of Vermont, in place of Minnie A. Benton. Incumbent's commission expires May 8, 1906.

VIRGINIA.

Louis L. Whitestone to be postmaster at Culpeper, in the county of Culpeper and State of Virginia, in place of Louis L. Whitestone. Incumbent's commission expires June 10, 1906.

WISCONSIN.

William Case to be postmaster at Mauston, in the county of Juneau and State of Wisconsin, in place of William Case. Incumbent's commission expires June 19, 1906.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 9, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by Rev. E. HEZ SWEM, pastor of the Second Baptist Church, Washington, D. C.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

MINORITY VIEWS ON IMMIGRATION BILL.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the minority may have the rest of the week to submit their views on the immigration bill now reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the minority of that committee have the remainder of this week to submit its views on the immigration bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, without objection, the urgent deficiency bill with Senate amendments.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. LITTAUER, Mr. TAWNEY, and Mr. LIVINGSTON.

REAPPRAISEMENT OF LAND AT PORT ANGELES, WASH.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16954) providing for the reappraisement of certain suburban lots in the town sites of Port Angeles, Wash.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the appraisement of the unappraised and the reappraisement of all unsold and undisposed-of suburban lots not reserved for public purposes in the town site of Port Angeles, Wash., and all of said lots so appraised and reappraised to be subject to sale at private entry only at such reappraised price.

The following amendments recommended by the committee were read:

In lines 4 and 5 strike out the words "the appraisement of the unappraised and."

In lines 7 and 8 strike out the words "appraised and."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire what this bill is? As I caught the title of the bill it is for the reappraisement of certain lands heretofore set aside for sale. Why is a reappraisement wanted; to lower the price?

Mr. CUSHMAN. The gentleman is entirely correct. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for the reappraisement of about 1,000 acres of land in the State of Washington. The town site of Port Angeles, in Washington, was land belonging to the Government; it was a Federal reservation. The main portion of that town site is not affected by this bill. Lying west of the main part of the city of Port Angeles is a tract of about 1,000 acres of land; that land was divided into 10-acre blocks in 1892, about fourteen years ago. These 10-acre blocks were appraised by the Government, and the appraisal was so high that in fourteen years only 5 blocks out of the original total of 166 blocks were taken by private entry. The Government desires that that land shall enter the hands of private settlers at a fair and reasonable price. This bill has been referred to the Public Land Department and favorably reported. All they ask is for a reappraisement of the remaining blocks, about 136 blocks representing about 1,000 acres.

Mr. PAYNE. As I understand it, the boom has not caught up to the price that was made in 1892?

Mr. CUSHMAN. There was no boom. This land was mere agricultural land, divided into 10-acre blocks, and the price of $100 an acre—over $1,000 for 10 acres of agricultural land—was placed upon some of it. Nobody would buy it at this figure. It is the wish of the citizens and the Government that there should be a reappraisement of these lands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

TUITION FOR NONRESIDENT PUPILS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 4302) to amend the provision in an act approved March 3, 1899, imposing a charge for tuition on nonresident pupils in the public schools of the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provision in the act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1899, which reads: "That hereafter pupils shall not be admitted to or taught free of charge in the public schools of the District of Columbia who do not reside in said District, or whose parents do not reside or are not engaged in business or public duties therein," and so forth, be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"That hereafter pupils shall not be admitted to or taught free of charge in the public schools of the District of Columbia who do not reside in said District, or who during such tutelage do not own property in and pay taxes levied by the government of the District of Columbia, or whose parents do not reside or are not engaged in business or public duties therein, or during such tutelage pay taxes levied by the government of the District of Columbia: Provided, That such pupils may be admitted to and taught in said public schools on the payment of such amount, to be fixed by the board of trustees, with the approval of the Commissioners of said District, as will cover the expense of their tuition and cost of text-books and school supplies used by them; and all payments hereunder shall be paid into the Treasury, one-half to the credit of the United States and one-half to the credit of the District of Columbia."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the gentleman from Wisconsin explain the purpose of this bill to the House.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is simply this: That people living here in the District who are nonresidents—not officially employed or engaged in the District, but residents of other States—must, if they send their children to school, pay a reasonable charge for such education. That is all there is of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And they do not do it now?

Mr. BABCOCK. They do not.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CORRECTING TYPOGRAPHICAL ERROR IN ACT RELATING TO STREET PARKING IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 4168.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 4168) to correct a typographical error in act approved July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to vest in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia control of street parking in said District.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress approved July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to vest in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia control of street parking in said District," be, and it is hereby, amended by striking out of paragraph 5 of section 2 of said act the words "Class B," and substituting therefor the words "Classes (a) and (b)."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, it is utterly impossible to understand what this bill means without an explanation.

Mr. BABCOCK. In a paragraph of a bill passed three years ago by an error of the Clerk it was numbered "B," when it should have been numbered "A and B." This simply makes a correction and does not affect the law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is Class A and what is Class B?

Mr. BABCOCK. Perhaps I should have said paragraph. The report is somewhat lengthy to read, but I will read what the Commissioners say and perhaps that will clarify it.

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have to recommend, with reference to Senate bill 4168, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, to correct a typographical error in act approved July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to vest in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia control of street parking in said District," which was referred to them at your instance for their report as to its merits, that it be modified as follows:

Line 6 strike out all after the word "amended."

Line 7 strike out the words "sentence in" and insert in lieu thereof the words "by striking out of;" same line, strike out the word "which."

Strike out the remainder of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the words "the words 'Class B,' and substituting therefor the words 'Classes (a) and (b).'"

A copy of the bill modified as herein proposed is herewith transmitted.

I do not understand it affects the law at all. It simply clarifies it and corrects an error of the printer; that is all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just a typographical error.

Mr. BABCOCK. That is all; yes, sir.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CONTRACTS WITH THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 10074.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10074) in relation to contracts with the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That in all cases where the Commissioners of the District of Columbia contract for work or material involving a sum not exceeding $500, it shall not be necessary to execute a formal written contract with bond; but no work capable of execution under a single contract, nor any purchase of material where the total expenditure involved is greater than $500, shall be subdivided or lessened for the purpose of reducing the sum of money to be paid therefor to less than that amount.

SEC. 2. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions thereof are hereby repealed.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Line 5, insert after the word "necessary" the words "for said Commissioners."

Line 6, strike out the words "execute a formal written contract with bond" and insert in lieu thereof the words "require a bond with said contract."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question in reference to this, reserving the right to object.

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does this relieve the Commissioners from the necessity of advertising for purchases of less than $500?

Mr. BABCOCK. I will say, Mr. Speaker, it relieves the Commissioners simply of taking bonds for contracts under $500. They are obliged to advertise and make a written contract, but under the present regulations these bonds and contracts all have to go to the Auditor in the Treasury Department, and it simply gets rid of a lot of red tape that is unnecessary in a contract for fifty or a hundred or two hundred dollars, usually performed by well-known and responsible contractors.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand that there is no real necessity for a contract for the purchase of less than $500 or advertising for work at an expense of less than $500; but I also know the Departments here which are now limited to $100 are seeking to have that limitation extended to $500 and allow the purchase of supplies or anything they want up to the extent of $500 without advertising.

Mr. BABCOCK. This has nothing to do with the purchase of supplies at all. This applies principally to street work or contracts after they have been advertised and been submitted. The contracts have to be executed just the same and the contracts signed. That is a committee amendment, but it relieves them of demanding a bond, which the Commissioners say in the small amounts is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does not relieve them of requiring the advertising?

Mr. BABCOCK. Not at all.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

INSANE CRIMINALS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 4426.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 4426) to amend section 927 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, relating to insane criminals.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 927 of an act entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901, as amended by the acts approved January 31 and June 30, 1902, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 927. INSANE CRIMINALS.—When any person tried upon an indictment or information for an offense is acquitted on the sole ground that he was insane at the time of its commission, that fact shall be set forth by the jury in their verdict; and whenever a person is indicted or is charged by an information for an offense, and before trial or after a verdict of guilty prima facie evidence is submitted to the court that the accused is then insane, the court may cause a jury to be impaneled from the jurors then in attendance on the court or, if the regular jurors have been discharged, may cause a sufficient number of jurors to be drawn to inquire into the insanity of the accused, and said inquiry shall be conducted in the presence and under the direction of the court. If the jury shall find the accused to be then insane, or if an accused person shall be acquitted by the jury solely on the ground of insanity, the court may certify the fact to the Secretary of the Interior, who may order such person to be confined in the hospital for the insane, and said person and his estate shall be charged with the expense of his support in the said hospital. The person whose sanity is in question shall be entitled to his bill of exceptions and an appeal as in other cases."

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the gentleman from Wisconsin give some information regarding this bill. What change does it make in the existing law?

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] who reported this bill and understands it thoroughly.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the only change in the law is the insertion of the words "or information," in the tenth line, after the word "indictment;" and the words "or is charged by an information," in the thirteenth line, after the word "indicted." The original act remains intact, except for these two insertions. The point is this: Under the present law a man charged by indictment, or for a felony, can be tried on the question of his insanity. The jury may on the trial on the merits return a verdict of not guilty, but must find "not guilty because insane;" or, if the court thinks the man is insane, he may impanel a jury on the question to determine his sanity. This does not apply in the District code to misdemeanors, or where the charge is by information; and the object of this bill is to make it apply the same on a charge by information as by indictment. The Commissioners called the attention of the committee to the fact that there are a number of cases now pending where the charge is on information against parties who are really insane, and there is no procedure by which this question can be determined, as in the case of an indicted man. This is the only change in the law.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I want to ask the gentleman with reference to the provision in the bill, I believe in the last section, providing that the Secretary of the Interior may order such a person to be confined in the hospital for the insane. I would like to know why the Secretary of the Interior should have charge of such a proceeding. After the party is found to be insane, then there is some sort of report to be made to the Secretary of the Interior, and he is to make an order in regard to this matter. Why should the Secretary of the Interior have control of this subject?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. The Secretary of the Interior has charge of the Government Insane Hospital, and under the existing law all insane persons are, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, placed in the insane asylum.

Mr. SULZER. Where are these insane criminals sent?
Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. To the Government asylum.
Mr. SULZER. St. Elizabeth's?
Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I suppose that is the one.
Mr. SULZER. That is the only one, is it not?
Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. It is the only one I know of.
Mr. SULZER. There are serious charges against that institution that this House should investigate.
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not the duty of the authorities at the insane asylum to receive these criminals without the action of the ministerial head of one of the Departments?
Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I understand that these all come under the charge of the Secretary of the Interior.
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It seems it is left to him to order these persons to be received?
Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. That is the present law, and we did not seek to change that.
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. He may order the prisoner to be confined?
Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. In the hospital for the insane.
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think that is a very unwise law.
Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. It is the present law.
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas (continuing). That an Executive Department of this Government should control a prisoner of that kind. I think the courts ought to control. The mandate of the court should be that he be confined in the insane asylum and not on the dictation of any executive officer. I do not know of any executive officer of the Government I would not rather deprive of any rights than the present Secretary of the Interior, but when you give him the right to act in any of these matters he will arbitrarily refuse to carry out the laws of the land.
Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I am informed that the District of Columbia has not any insane hospital of its own, and that the only hospital located in the District is that under governmental control, and under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. I presume that is why this provision is put in the bill.
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then undoubtedly it would be impossible to have it changed.
Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. That is the existing law, and we have not amended that feature of the law.
Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I understand from the statement of the gentleman, the only change the committee recommends in the existing law is to put trials by information upon the same basis as trials under indictment?
Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Exactly.
Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, I assume that the defense of insanity can be made against charges presented by information just the same now as against those made by indictment?
Mr. BABCOCK. No.
Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, the insanity of the accused does not need to be in the verdict in information cases.
Mr. TAYLOR. That is true.
Mr. CRUMPACKER. Without the verdict containing the statement that the defendant is acquitted on the ground of insanity?
Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Upon the sole ground of insanity.
Mr. CRUMPACKER. The sole ground of insanity. Now, on the question about the Secretary of the Interior confining insane criminals in public hospitals, that I understand is discretionary with him, and it is presumed that he exercises the power to confine insane criminals in hospitals where it is necessary for their treatment and for the protection of the public, but not as a punishment.
Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Not as a punishment.
Mr. BABCOCK. Absolutely none.
Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Of course not.
Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is a matter in relation to which he must inform himself and act for the benefit of the individual or for the benefit of society and determine whether the individual shall be committed to the hospital or not.
Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Exactly; and the only duty of the court after a verdict is rendered is to certify the fact of the verdict to the Secretary, for his discretion.
Mr. CRUMPACKER. You do not provide how the Secretary shall inform himself, of course, about the conditions.
Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Nothing beyond the fact that the original act, which we do not amend in that particular, provides that after this fact is certified to the Secretary he may order such person confined in a hospital, and if he has an estate the estate is chargeable with his support.
Mr. CRUMPACKER. Of course, that might possibly be construed to mean that he might do it as a sort of penalty?
Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. It is not intended as such.
Mr. CRUMPACKER. It could not be?
Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. It is to take care of persons charged with crime and found not guilty by reason of their mental condition.
Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand this, when a man is charged with crime, and the jury acquits him on the ground of insanity, this machinery is called into operation, and the jury determines that he is insane, and the Secretary of the Interior can, if he chooses to, refuse to confine him in an asylum.
Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. The language of the original act would appear to be discretionary, because it uses the words "he may."
Mr. WILLIAMS. Then do you not think it would be wise to send this bill back to the committee, and direct them to bring in a bill which will not leave to the Secretary of the Interior that discretion, if the proper court declares the man to be insane, that an executive officer of the Federal Government, with no duties in relation to the District of Columbia whatever, may or may not, in his discretion, confine him in an insane asylum?
Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me, I do not believe it is safe to amend this bill in that way. I think the Secretary should have some discretion, as stated by the gentleman from Indiana. A man may be a dangerous insane criminal or the offense for which he is arrested may be simply a misdemeanor. Now, this legislation is brought in here because there are men confined in the jail in the District, and the authorities are powerless to deal with them. They have not been indicted, but arrested by the police on information, as I suppose the lawyers call it (for I am not a lawyer), and the judges of the police court of the District of Columbia have held that they are powerless to handle these cases because of that technical fact.
Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. Is the gentleman from Wisconsin now talking for the information of the House or just for the information of the gentleman from Mississippi? The House can not hear anything that is going on.
The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The Chair awaits the pleasure of the galleries to cease conversation. [After a pause.] The Chair has discovered that he was mistaken as to the galleries. They seem to be in order, and the conversation seems to be on the floor. [Laughter.]
Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to deny to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] any information that I had; but I realized that when I was talking to the gentleman from Mississippi I was informing a very large part of the House. [Laughter.] Now, this is a very simple proposition, and I was endeavoring to explain that it was brought to the attention of the committee by one of the judges here, who said that they had at present three criminals confined in jail, concerning whom there was no law to proceed; that the men were insane; that they could not let them out because they were dangerous, and one of the judges came to me personally appealing for prompt action. He said: "Something must be done by Congress, because we can not send these men to the insane asylum and we have no authority to keep them in jail, and there should be some amendment to this law."
Now, all in the world that this bill does is to put a case that comes before the court on information in exactly the same status as one that comes before the court on indictment. That is all. It does not change the authority of the Secretary of the Interior. We have nothing to do with that, and as I said to the gentleman from Mississippi, I believe it would be dangerous to take that discretion away from him. We never have heard a complaint.
Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin state to the House what the practice has been under the existing law with respect to exercising the discretion which the law now vests in the Secretary? In other words, when a criminal has been adjudged insane, and his residence is in some State, has the Secretary ever sent that man to the State for confinement in an asylum in the State in which he resides, or does the Secretary send him to an asylum here in the District, and then charge the State, or can he under the law charge the State, with the expense of maintaining and treating him in an asylum here in the District of Columbia?
Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I can not answer that question in detail. The practice is the same here as in Maryland and other States. If a citizen of Maryland is confined here in the asylum, the State or the county must pay the expenses, or they must take the party away and take him where he belongs.
Mr. TAWNEY. That demonstrates the necessity for a discretion being vested somewhere, and it ought to be invested in an officer who has control and supervision over the asylum.
Mr. BABCOCK. As to the discretion of the Secretary, I never heard the question brought up. I understood that when the decision of the court has been reached it has been sent to the Secretary, and it is a formal matter and is carried out. The party is sent to the asylum unless there is some special reason shown—that he is a resident of another State, or that he has relatives, or property, or friends who will take care of him in other places. But if you make it mandatory to send the prisoners there that would be all there would be of it; he would be put in the asylum, and you couldn't get him out.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understood the gentleman from Wisconsin say that there are prisoners in the jail who are insane who the judge of the court says can not be disposed of under existing law.

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is certainly some provision for a civil inquisition to determine the sanity of a man; and if he is insane his commitment to the insane hospital, is there not? I assume that provision is made for the treatment of insane patients in jails and hospitals in the District of Columbia. Is there not?

Mr. BABCOCK. We have endeavored to pass little acts in relation to this very matter. The laws have not been complete here, and there has been very much embarrassment in handling insane people.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am sure there is provision in the District Code for a civil inquisition for examination into the condition of men who are suspected of being insane with a view to their treatment in the hospital; but here, as I understand, the judge of the court has not the power to make an inquiry and make an order for their commitment, but all he can do is to turn them out on the public and let the proper tribunal or magistrate, if they are so disposed to do it, take charge of the subject, and if not, he is turned at large.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. There is a civil provision for taking care of the insane, but this is criminal law.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, if I may be allowed, we have a law of this kind in Massachusetts. Where people are under indictment for an offense and are held in jail waiting for trial, we have a provision of law which is common to a great many States—that the judge of the court in which the indictment is pending has the right, or the officer who controls him, to transfer him to an asylum for treatment and examination. It is not necessary to have a jury, and to have the question of sanity tried.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. It is in my State; it requires a jury in a criminal case.

Mr. HOAR. In my State he can be transferred without any trial to the asylum for examination. It is a simple matter, under which we operate without any difficulty. Of course, in the first part of the section, where people have been acquitted by a jury on the ground of insanity the civil provision applies, and there is no need to have the Secretary of the Interior or anybody else have discretion, because the superintendent of police or the court officer will make complaint to the civil authorities and have the man committed to custody if he has been acquitted by reason of insanity. That is the way we deal with it in the old-established State that I come from.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. We have in Ohio a law quite similar to this, and it works well.

Mr. HOAR. Do you have to empanel a jury?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. While the man is awaiting trial?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes. He can be tried as to his sanity before he is tried on the indictment.

Mr. HOAR. There is no reason for this where you have the habeas corpus provision.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. There are many ways in which this matter might be handled, but it seems to me that this is a sensible and proper proceeding, and he did not see fit to amend the general law——

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I desire a little information regarding this matter. What I wish to know from the gentleman on the District Committee who has reported this bill is this: Under whose jurisdiction is this insane asylum known as "St. Elizabeth's?"

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Under the jurisdiction of the United States Government.

Mr. SULZER. Do the Commissioners of the District of Columbia have charge of it?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I understand not. I understand they contract, or make some arrangement, with the Secretary of the Interior to place these insane people in the asylum.

Mr. SULZER. Then the asylum is practically under the control or direction of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. That is my information.

Mr. SULZER. Does not the gentleman think that is a mistake—to have this asylum in the District of Columbia under the control of a member of the Cabinet? Should it not be under the control of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia or under the control of the Congress?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. This asylum is used for men all over the United States, placed there by the United States Government.

Mr. SULZER. That makes no difference.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I am not prepared to state.

Mr. SULZER. I think it would be very much better, in order to have the law carried out, to have this asylum of St. Elizabeth's placed under the control of the District Commissioners or the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for a few moments to say something in regard to this matter.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. SULZER. Only a few minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words regarding the administration of this insane asylum known as "St. Elizabeth's." We have some knowledge from what we read in the newspapers, and I have some personal knowledge from what reputable citizens and doctors of the District of Columbia have told me of what is going on and has been going on for years in that asylum—of the abuses practiced there. I believe that the time is at hand when the House of Representatives should take some decisive action in regard to the control, the direction, and the management of St. Elizabeth's Insane Asylum. We know that all insane people, whether criminal or not, in the District of Columbia are sent to that asylum; and we know that there have been within the last few years a great many serious complaints made about the mismanagement of that insane asylum. I am informed that two resolutions have been introduced in this House and are now pending in the committee calling for an investigation of this asylum, and I believe that these atrocious charges which have been made in the public press, and to Members of Congress generally, ought to be investigated, and investigated without further delay. The people demand it. It is my belief from what I have been informed—and I have every reason to believe that the information is reliable and accurate and true—that the mismanagement of this asylum, so far as the treatment of the insane patients is concerned, is barbarous in the extreme. The cruelties and the outrages which have been inflicted and perpetrated on some of these unfortunate insane patients in that asylum are enough to make a reasonable human being shed tears of sadness. It is a disgrace to mankind.

I do not want to repeat here and now the terrible stories which have come to many of us regarding the torture, the inhumanity, the cruelty, the barbarism of the treatment of some of these poor afflicted insane patients in that insane asylum; but I do want to say that if these charges are true, or even half true, it is a terrible indictment, a terrible disgrace to the District of Columbia, to the people of this country, and a frightful reflection upon the Congress of the United States. I insist that the chairman and the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia should carefully consider this matter and the pending resolution before that committee for the investigation of that asylum and report it, so that we can speedily find out whether these asylum officials are guilty of these outrages, inhumanities, and barbarous cruelties. It is alleged that there is a system of graft in that institution which should be exposed, and the guilty officials prosecuted. This investigation must come. It can not be smothered much longer.

We have legislated in this country to prevent corporal punishment in our penal institutions. I am now, always have been, and always will be, opposed to the infliction of corporal punishment in penal institutions.

When I was a member of the legislature of the State of New York I had passed a law to prevent corporal punishment in the prisons of that State. The time has come, Mr. Speaker, when the people of the District of Columbia, when the people of this country, demand that these poor, unfortunate patients in St. Elizabeth's Insane Asylum shall be treated as human beings. We must do our duty, and do it now, in this matter. I protest against further delay. It is a disgrace to the Congress that we do not bring these offending officers before a committee of this House, put them on their oaths, and find out whether the charges made are true or not. We should act quickly and find out the truth. We should have an impartial investigation, let in the light, and get at the facts. Those who make the charges should be called to testify under oath, and the hearings should be open, and not behind closed doors. It is farcical and a travesty on justice to permit these officials to investigate themselves and whitewash themselves. This House or a committee from it should conduct the investigation—no star chamber proceedings, no whitewashing, no favoritism. We want all the facts, and sooner or later we will get them, and when we do I believe they will bring the blush of shame to the cheeks of every humane man in our country. Let us have publicity regarding the control and management of St. Elizabeth's Insane Asylum. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that he commenced with the statement that certain conditions and practices are alleged to exist in St. Elizabeth's Hospital, but that he knew nothing about the truth of them and therefore he would not presume to say that they were true. He closed his speech, however, with a direct charge of the things that have appeared in the newspapers. St. Elizabeth's Insane Asylum is a governmental institution under the control of the Government. It takes care of the insane of the Army and Navy and of the District of Columbia. I want to say, regardless of whether these charges are true or false, that the administration of St. Elizabeth's Hospital, as shown by the records, is the most economic of any of the insane hospitals in the District of Columbia. The question of whether or not these charges are true is now being investigated. This is not the time, and there is no man in the House who has the information that would justify him in indulging in the criticism the gentleman from New York has indulged in, because there is no proof of these charges; they rest upon nothing but mere allegations.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman says an investigation is being conducted——

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand the board of managers are investigating——

Mr. SULZER. Investigating themselves.

Mr. TAWNEY. Are investigating these charges.

Mr. SULZER. Are investigating themselves.

The SPEAKER. To which one of the gentlemen does the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman from Minnesota say that the board of managers of the institution, which the gentleman from New York suggests have been derelict, are investigating themselves?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not say that they are investigating themselves; I said they are investigating the charges that are made in the newspapers, or by individuals through the press, in regard to the management of that institution.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit one other question? Is there any law to-day which provides for an investigation or examination of these institutions regularly by any committee of Congress?

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no law of which I know.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is there any law which requires anything like a systematic investigation of these institutions at stated intervals and public reports at any time by anybody?

Mr. TAWNEY. I know of no law which requires that to be done. This institution is under the control of the Government and under the immediate control of the Secretary of the Interior, and it is within his power, I presume, to order an investigation whenever he sees fit to do so. It is also within the power of this House, if it sees fit, to investigate and——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. TAWNEY. Just a moment; but what I was saying was that until this House was in possession of the proof as to whether or not these charges are true it was hardly fair for a Member of the House to stand up here and assert they were true, and then indulge in criticising the management upon that basis, when he admits that he knows nothing as to the truth of these charges. The Committee on Appropriations is now preparing the sundry civil appropriation bill. That bill carries the appropriation for the maintenance of this institution, and the committee proposes, as far as it can with the time it has at its command, to go into the matter as far as it possibly can and investigate the management as thoroughly as possible.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does not the gentleman think that there ought to be a law upon the statute books which would require regular examinations and reports to Congress by some committee of Congress, with authority to inquire into the facts?

Mr. TAWNEY. I think that would be a very good law, and the gentleman from Wisconsin can introduce a bill of that kind, and I will do what I can to assist in securing its passage.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I had always supposed, until I received the reply from the gentleman from Minnesota, that there was such a law.

Mr. TAWNEY. None except the general law, which gives to the Secretary of the Interior the power to make an investigation whenever, in his judgment, it was necessary.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. My own judgment is that Congress, being itself primarily responsible, ought not to leave it to the discretion of any executive officer to investigate or not to investigate public institutions of this kind which are under its control. I am not making this statement because of what has been urged by the gentleman from New York, because I heard only the last two or three sentences of his remarks, but I am led to say this to the gentleman from Minnesota because of a charge which was made very recently by a highly respectable citizen of Washington concerning an alleged atrocious wrong perpetrated upon an inmate of an institution of this city, an investigation of which was hushed up for the sake of the people implicated. In my judgment Congress has been grossly derelict in not having long ago enacted a law requiring a rigid, impartial examination of these institutions, every one of them, once a year, by some committee of Congress, and an annual report of such examination to Congress.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a few minutes. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield me a few minutes?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. How long a time do you want?

Mr. SULZER. Three or four minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio yields the gentleman from New York five minutes.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, just a few words. I desire to say I practically concur in what the gentleman from Wisconsin has just said—that the Congress of the United States has been derelict, most derelict, in its duty in regard to the management of the insane asylum known as "St. Elizabeth's." These horrible charges are made, and specifically made, by reputable citizens. They should be investigated. I say an official in an insane asylum that abuses and ill treats an insane inmate is a despicable scoundrel. The gentleman from Minnesota stated that I said these charges were true. I have every reason to believe they are true; but I did not state of my own knowledge that the charges were true. I said, and I repeat, that the people who make these charges are among the most reputable citizens in the District—some of them leading doctors; and that they want to come before a committee of the Congress and testify under oath to the horrible cruelties and barbarities which have been going on for several years in St. Elizabeth's. What did the committee state to these gentlemen who came here asking for this investigation?

The committee turned them over to the officials of the institution and these officials, I am informed, are now investigating themselves. What a farce! What a spectacle is presented by these officials charged with these barbarities, these inhumanities, these cruelties—what a spectacle, I say, is presented to the country—when the Congress allows them to investigate themselves! Just think of that. It is to laugh. It is exactly like the investigation which went on under the trustees of the great insurance companies in the city of New York. Under the management of the directors or the trustees of these insurance companies from year to year they investigated themselves, and then issued the reports to the policy holders and the public generally telling what honest men they were, how they had conserved the interests of the policy holders, and how safely and honestly everything was done and managed. At the next meeting of the board of directors some member would rise up and move to have the officials' salaries increased ten, twenty, thirty, forty, or fifty thousand dollars more a year. It was ridiculous, but it went on.

So I have no doubt that after these officials, or trustees, or directors, of St. Elizabeth's Insane Asylum get through investigating themselves they will send us their report on the same basis and along the same lines, and then the gentleman from Minnesota will make up the sundry civil bill and make an appropriation increasing their salaries a little more. I say, again, that we should bring these officers before a committee of the House, put them under oath, and confront them with their accusers, and get at the truth; and if we do that, we will show, in my opinion, a condition of affairs existing in that institution that will bring the blush of shame to the face of every humane Member in Congress and cause the immediate enactment of laws that will forever prevent a repetition of these disgraceful barbarities. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, this discussion has been interesting, but in no way reflects any light upon the merits of this bill, and I ask for a vote.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FALSE FIRE ALARMS.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the bill H. R. 14513.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14513) to prevent the giving of false alarms of fires in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, this bill is reported by substitute, and I ask that the substitute only be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the amendment by way of a substitute be read and omit the reading of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to willfully or knowingly give a false alarm of fire within the District of Columbia, and any person or persons violating the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine not exceeding $100 or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

"SEC. 2. That prosecutions for violation of the provisions of this act shall be on information filed in the police court by the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia or by any of his assistants.

"SEC. 3. That this act shall be in effect from and after its passage."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

CONDEMNATION OF LAND FOR STREETS.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I now call up for consideration the bill H. R. 17217.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17217) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," regulating proceedings for condemnation of land for streets.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to inquire whether it will be in time to raise the point of order that this bill is on the wrong Calendar after the reading of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The point of order can be raised at any time before consideration of the bill has begun.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that this bill ought to be upon the Union Calendar. For what reason, the Chair will ask the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It makes a charge upon the Federal Government, I understand, by providing one-half of the expenses of street condemnations shall be borne by the Federal Government.

Mr. BABCOCK. The bill makes no appropriation whatever of any kind.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman has his eye upon the paragraph or section, will he be kind enough to call the Chair's attention to it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The purpose of this bill, if I am correctly informed, is to make the Federal Government responsible for one-half of the cost of opening streets.

The SPEAKER. To what part of the bill does the gentleman refer?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Page 5, line 20.

The SPEAKER. Which is as follows:

If the total amount of the damages awarded by the jury and the cost and expenses of the proceedings be in excess of the total amount of the assessments for benefits, such expense shall be borne and paid equally by the United States and the District of Columbia.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, this bill is merely to provide a proper method for street openings. It does, as the gentleman from New York states, provide—

If the total amount of the damages awarded by the jury and the cost and expenses of the proceedings be in excess of the total amount of the assessments for benefits, such expense shall be borne and paid equally by the United States and the District of Columbia.

But that is merely a method of proceeding, and does not make any direct appropriation.

The SPEAKER. Precisely.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is that the law already?

Mr. OLCOTT. There has never been any general law as to how the excess of expenses should be borne in connection with street openings. This bill merely follows the general act that the United States Government shall pay one half of the expenses of the city and the District of Columbia the other half. It is merely following the general law in reference to expenditures.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to be of the opinion that this legislation covered by the paragraph read by the Chair, to which the gentleman calls attention, does make a charge upon the Treasury, and that the bill should be upon the Union Calendar.

Mr. OLCOTT. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. CRUMPACKER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of a bill of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17217) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," regulating proceedings for condemnation of land for streets.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky objects. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT] is recognized for one hour, if he wishes that time.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from New York will allow me to make a suggestion, he may, if he does not wish to occupy any time for general debate, ask that general debate be now closed, and proceed with the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. OLCOTT. As far as I am individually concerned I myself should be most gratified to do that, but I understood the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] to say that he wished to have some time for general debate.

Mr. SIMS. I wish some time for general debate.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that I shall not want to occupy an hour in general debate, and if the gentleman from Tennessee will agree to half an hour on each side, that would be entirely satisfactory to me and sufficient for my purposes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, let the gentleman from New York use such portion of his time as he wishes. I wish to be recognized in my own right.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, this bill is the result of a considerable amount of work that has been done in the Committee on the District of Columbia, through a subcommittee appointed for the specific purpose of establishing some method of procedure to be followed when property is taken for the extension or widening of streets. Heretofore each bill providing for a specific widening or extension has also made——

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. OLCOTT. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I do not find in this bill any provision for serving actual notice upon the owners of the property, even though they reside here in the District of Columbia, unless they are the owners of the fee.

Mr. OLCOTT. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to make a general statement, and then I will come to that with great pleasure?

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Very well.

Mr. OLCOTT. As I said, Mr. Chairman, the method has seemed to us to be extremely cumbersome. When Congress decides to take any particular block of land to extend some street, it is necessary to discuss the method of procedure to be followed in that particular case. The result of that has been not only unnecessary delay at the time the several bills have been under discussion, but has also necessitated each specific act to be unnecessarily examined by the corporation counsel as to the procedure to be followed.

This, of course, is an absurdity. It is entirely artificial, and sometimes the risk is run of the proceedings being illegal, because of the accidental omission of some essential in the specific act, when, if there were general sections in the code of procedure, the matter could be one of regular routine work, and it would leave to Congress only the necessity of passing a bill to determine upon the extension of a particular street, directing that the procedure be under the general code. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT] has spoken relative to the matter of actual service. I would call his attention to section 491c.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. That section makes no provision whatever for actual notice, although the owner may reside in the District of Columbia.

Mr. OLCOTT. That particular section provides first for advertisement in a particular manner, and then for service upon the owners of the fee, provided they are known, and also upon the tenants and occupants of the land. It may be impossible to know all the owners of the land to be taken, and it seemed to us that if anybody in the occupation of land as a tenant were served, he would give notice to the owner of the land himself.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I suggest to the gentleman that the owner of a life estate is entitled to notice before you take his property. The owner of a freehold estate living here in the city would be entitled to notice.

Mr. OLCOTT. That owner would unquestionably be known, and he would get personal notice in addition to the advertisement.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. There is no provision for his being notified at all.

Mr. OLCOTT. The provision is that the marshal shall serve notice upon such owners of the fee of land to be condemned as can be found, and the tenants and occupants.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. The gentleman does not attach sufficient force to the words "owner in fee." The owner in fee is a different individual from the owner of a life estate. A man may own an estate for life and at his death it goes to his children, and they perhaps are residing right here in the city of Washington and would receive no notice.

Mr. OLCOTT. I take it that if the owner of the fee is served, the owner of the life estate would probably get notice.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. But the proceeding would be null and void; you are taking a man's private property without notice, without his day in court, without any compensation, without any opportunity to be heard, and devoting it to a public use, and you only serve notice on somebody else.

Mr. OLCOTT. No; we provide that notice shall be served upon the owner, the tenant, and occupant.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Your bill provides that you shall serve notice on the owner of the fee, but there is no other provision for notice on the owner of the life estate.

Mr. OLCOTT. It says upon the tenants and occupants of the same—meaning the land.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. If the gentleman thinks that is sufficient notice, I am sure I wouldn't look at it as a sufficient notice at all. Suppose the gentleman owns an estate for life and notice is served upon his tenant. That is no service upon him.

Mr. OLCOTT. I believe that the provision is sufficiently broad, because I think if any tenant or occupant of the land was served, unquestionably the owner of the fee or life estate would be quickly notified, and it seemed to us that it was necessary to make some provision where we could not get the owners of all the interests in the land.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. The gentleman thinks that by serving notice on one interested party, it would be sufficient notice on all interested parties?

Mr. OLCOTT. I think, on the contrary, that all the parties should be served if they can be found.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman, my colleague, a question.

Mr. OLCOTT. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PAYNE. Why does the committee reverse the rule that has been practiced here for several years, that in passing special acts of this kind, requiring the difference to be paid by the District, and not half by the United States and half by the District?

Mr. OLCOTT. I would like to say in regard to that that we had a great deal of discussion relative to the compensation for the property and the expense being paid by the United States Government and the District of Columbia. It seemed to us that there was only one fair thing to do, and that was to follow the law as laid down in the act of 1878 for the payment of the expenses of this District.

Mr. PAYNE. This law is spoken of as something sacred and binding, having the force of a contract. One paper said that it was the constitution of the District of Columbia. Does the committee regard the act as so sacred that it can not be amended by Congress at any time under the circumstances?

Mr. OLCOTT. In reply to my colleague, I will say that the committee has quite a different idea of it. But they thought that this provision of the law was fair and that the District of Columbia was entitled to ask that this excess be paid one-half by the Government?

Mr. PAYNE. It would seem to me that the opening and use of streets is almost entirely for the benefit of the people residing in the District, and not for the benefit of the Government of the United States. I see that the report states it as an argument that the United States owns the fee of the streets. They take it in trust for the benefit of the people of the District, and I am unable to see why the rule that Congress has enforced for a number of years is not the correct rule, and the difference should be paid by assessments of the District and not divided between the District and the United States Government.

Mr. MORRELL. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me?

Mr. OLCOTT. I will.

Mr. MORRELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] if he thinks it is quite fair for the taxpayers of the District, when the United States Government wants to open one of these great broad boulevards in conformity with the plan which was laid out by L'Enfant—if he does not think the United States Government should pay a portion of that expense?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not in the opening of streets. I do not see why the United States should pay a portion of that expense. I do not see why the city that is receiving so much benefit from the United States, the location of the Capitol, the half of all their expenses paid, should not at least contribute enough land to open these streets which are such a benefit to property. I can not see for the life of me why this total expense should not be assessed upon the land that receives the benefit of it, and in this city the benefit far exceeds the amount of land taken. I am willing that the Government should pay half of the expenses of this government here in the District of Columbia, and the District gets the best end of that bargain. The people of the District get the cheapest tax rate of any city in the United States and greatest benefit and the greatest street improvement and park improvement of any city in the United States. But it is the capital of the nation, of course.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I agree with my colleague from New York [Mr. PAYNE] in feeling that when the street openings affect a small section of the city practically all of the damage should be assessed against the abutting property; but I do feel that if it is right that the Government should pay half of the expenses, as was provided in 1878 in the general law, it is right that the expenses of any particular street opening or of the creation of any great boulevard should be borne equally by the Government and the District.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Does the gentleman from New York think it is right for the Government to pay half the expenses of the District?

Mr. OLCOTT. Yes; I certainly do.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Does the gentleman think that it is right for the Government to pay three-quarters under this provision?

Mr. OLCOTT. There is no provision that provides that.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. In the first place, the District pays half of it and the United States pays half of that, and then the United States, as I understand it, pays half of that half. Does not the United States Government pay the additional expenses of running the government of the District?

Mr. BABCOCK. Only as appropriated by the Committee on Appropriations. The District revenues are turned into the United States Treasury and are separate and distinct from any other moneys. When the Committee on Appropriations appropriates, it may appropriate half out of that fund and half out of the fund of the United States.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I disagree with the gentleman from New York entirely that this Government should pay any part of the expenses, especially when the property in this District is not taxed at over one-half of its value.

Mr. OLCOTT. Of course if we are going into the whole question of the amount of taxes levied on the property of the District of Columbia, we will scarcely get through this bill to-day. I have very pronounced ideas in regard to that, and believe that in the treatment that the Government affords to the District of Columbia the Government gets quite as much as the District receives.

As far as the rest of the bill is concerned, with the exception of the single clause to which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT] has called attention——

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly obvious that my point is well taken, and the gentleman is too good a lawyer to stand up here and argue to the contrary. I suggest that we strike out the words "of the fee of," in line 22, and let it be served upon all of the owners of course.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if the only amendment he desires is the striking out of the words "of the fee?"

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. "Of the fee," so that the process shall be served upon the owners of the land.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would say that the committee is perfectly willing to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky to strike out the words in line 22, and if he will offer it at the proper time when the bill is read for amendments we will make no objection whatever. I would suggest now, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] occupy some of his time.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I shall discuss this measure in particular with reference to the amendment which I will offer at the proper time, striking out that part of the bill which provides that one-half of the excess of damage over benefits in any street-opening proposition shall be charged to the General Government. But, Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss, somewhat in a general way, the kind of government that we have here. It will be noticed that there is quoted in the report on this bill a letter from Mr. William G. Henderson, chairman of the committee on streets and avenues of the Washington Board of Trade. I will incorporate that letter in my remarks. The letter is a strong one. It is as follows:

WASHINGTON BOARD OF TRADE,
Washington, D. C., April 2, 1906.

DEAR SIR: As chairman of the committee on streets and avenues of the Washington Board of Trade, I beg leave to submit the following in advocacy of H. R. 17217, having reference to regulating proceedings for condemnation of land for streets. The bill indicates a most careful investigation and thorough familiarity with the subject and manifests an impartial treatment of the matter from both an equitable and legal point of view. In the first place, let me state that the title to the land for all streets and highways in the District of Columbia is vested absolutely in the United States and not in the District of Columbia, and not a single street or highway can be opened or extended unless Congress first authorizes it to be done.

The bill provides that land on each side of the street or highway opened, and other land benefited by the opening, shall be assessed for the actual benefits which it derives from the extension or opening, and that the cost and expenses in excess of the amount of the benefits actually derived by the property shall be borne and paid equally by the United States and the District of Columbia. This provision must appeal strongly to every fair-minded person. Inasmuch as Congress directs the opening or extension to be made and the United States takes absolute title to the land thus acquired and thereafter exercises absolute jurisdiction over it, the General Government should assume some portion of the expense and not place it wholly upon the District of Columbia, which acquires no title in the land condemned and has no control over it except to carry into effect the will of Congress as may be expressed from time to time by legislation.

When the present form of government was established Congress provided in the act establishing it that the United States and the District of Columbia should bear the expense share and share alike. This was done because the people were deprived of all power in the management and direction of the affairs of the District, and Congress took unto itself the power to direct what should be done, how it should be done, what money should be appropriated and how disbursed, and by whom disbursed. For some years in all legislation for the opening or extension of streets Congress provided for the expense to be paid one-half by the United States and one-half by the District of Columbia. The present bill, in recognition of the fact that no street can be opened without authority of Congress and that the title to the land when acquired vests in the United States, has fairly and justly provided that the United States and the District of Columbia shall equally bear the expense in excess of the benefits actually derived by the property along and adjacent to the extension or opening, which benefits actually derived shall be borne by said property.

The provision in the present bill as to the manner in which the expense of opening streets shall be borne and paid is preeminently fair and just and has been consistently urged by the Washington Board of Trade, and it is confidently believed that every member of your honorable committee, with a full understanding of the law and facts, will give his unqualified support to the provision. It is also believed that the Members of the House of Representatives, with full information on the subject, such as will be given to them by the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, will recognize the fairness and justice of this and the other provisions contained in the bill mentioned. In any event, it is hoped and believed that the committee will act according to its convictions of right and justice, and if any amendment must be made leave it to be done on the floor of the House. As chairman of the committee on streets and avenues of the Washington Board of Trade, I desire to commend as a whole the provisions of the bill as drafted by your subcommittee and introduced by Mr. OLCOTT, of your committee. I have the honor to remain,

Very respectfully,

WM. G. HENDERSON,
Chairman Committee on Streets and Avenues of the Washington Board of Trade.

The board of trade has often expressed itself in favor of the United States Government paying one-half of the expenses of all street-opening propositions. I believe that the people of the District of Columbia who pay the taxes believe that they are a tax-burdened people, and very unjustly so, as they think, because they are denied all voice in imposing these burdens. And that is true. Without reading, I will insert as a part of my remarks the different forms of government that have prevailed in the District of Columbia since it became the Federal city. Until the year 1871 it was a municipality, and provided its own expenses by its own taxation, and up to that time the entire cost to the District of Columbia was about $43,000,000 for seventy-one years. Then a form of government was made and styled the "Board of Public Works," and that Board of Public Works, on account of vast undertakings of importance, ran the city in debt—piled up a large bonded indebtedness and almost impoverished the people.

In order to get relief a form of government was proposed in 1874, as I now remember, appointing three commissioners, who were to be receivers to wind up the insolvent city government, and in 1878 a bill was reported and passed, creating the present form of city government and called the "organic act," and in that organic act it was provided that one-half of all the expenses of the District of Columbia should be borne by the Federal Treasury. Now, there were cogent reasons for that at that time which do not exist now. The District of Columbia from the time of the civil war to 1871 was practically a military camp; was overrun by an influx of population which came here for that reason, and the burdens of the District were run up by conditions over which the people themselves had no control. The people here now seriously complain that the fact that the total expense of the street openings, where there are damages in excess of benefits received, are placed upon the people of the District, so it is in spirit and in fact a repeal of the organic act of 1878.

As for myself I am now ready, willing, and anxious to repeal the organic act of 1878. It will not do to undertake to run this capital for all time to come under the organic act. One-half of the expenses of the District of Columbia, as it will be managed under its present form of government, will in no distant day exceed ten or twelve or fifteen million dollars a year. I have no objection to the Government of the United States assuming its proper proportion of the burdens of the city, so far as they are enhanced or increased or made by its occupation as a capital, but beyond that what interest has the United States Government in the continued street extensions and improvement of this District? Another complaint is made by the citizens of the District as a body that the Government is continually buying up the present taxed area and turning it into an untaxed asset of the Government; that the taxed area is continually on the decrease; all of which is true. Why? The Government does occasionally have to have some property in addition to what it has.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Is it not also true every time the Government buys up any tract in the District and makes a park of it that it enhances the value of the surrounding land many fold?

Mr. SIMS. Why, as far as my knowledge goes, that is true.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. It enhances the balance of the property ten times as much as the whole property would have been before the Government took this part of the land for a park.

Mr. SIMS. I could not speak with reference to each particular purchase of the Government, but I want to state to the gentleman how these Government purchases come about. It is true some of the Government's purchases are made upon the initiative of the Government, like the library site, like the sites for the respective office buildings for the two Houses of Congress, like the municipal building site. But in nine cases out of ten the Government is petitioned to buy property. Some people somewhere, who own a large body of adjacent land, think that they ought to have a park, that there ought to be a Government reservation in that particular section of the city, and they come to the committee of this House and make a showing that they ought to have this park or to have this Government's benefit; that it is a benefit to it as a capital and that it is a benefit to it as a city, and cite the fact that land is getting to be more valuable every day and that the Government ought to buy this land before it goes up; and so, in nine cases out of ten, the acquirement of Government property here is insisted upon, encouraged, and brought about by the activities of the property owners who are benefited, and there is a hardship in that, my friends. The people around where this improvement is made are benefited, but the taxpayers out at the other end of the capital, away off, are burdened. I want to read to you what gentlemen say about these things after it is done. We are now being petitioned, urged, and importuned to add on the south 100 acres to Rock Creek Park, and they are going virtually to give it to us by only accepting $428,000 for it, a little over $4,000 an acre, and without having examined the official record, I state what I see in the newspapers that it is assessed for taxation at only $180,000.

They are going to virtually contribute it to the Government for $428,000. On the other side of Rock Creek Park, of Sixteenth street extended, they want us to buy another large tract of land, because it is now cheap and will be high. Meridian Hill wants to bloom out and loom up as a great point of observation and have us buy 10 acres at the wee small sum of $60,000 an acre, thus withdrawing all these now taxed areas from taxation. Mr. Chairman, I wish to show you how this matter is discussed after we have yielded to these importunities and bought up lands that we do not need now, and nobody living knows when we will. But after it is done I want to read you how it is spoken of by the people who are talking about the cost of street openings. Now I read from an address by a very distinguished citizen of this District, Mr. Theodore W. Noyes, on page 14 of the document I hold in my hand. He says:

> It is to be remembered also in this connection that other American cities are steadily enlarging their boundaries and by direct annexation increasing from year to year by millions their assessed valuation, while in the case of the District of Columbia there is a steady reduction in the absolute amount of taxable real estate from year to year, corresponding to the condemnations made by the National Government in the Federal District and the nation's city for public purposes. For instance, in creating Rock Creek Park and the Zoological Park the Government took nearly 2,000 acres of land from the District's tax list and put them in the exempted column. A similar effect was produced, for further example, when valuable blocks of land were condemned as the sites for the Congressional Library building and the so-called "city post-office." Clearly where an increasing aggregate valuation is placed upon a decreasing property list the burden of assessment upon that property grows heavier and heavier with abnormal rapidity.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Is it not a further fact that taking this 2,000 acres for Rock Creek Park enhanced the value of the property around it, throughout Cleveland Park, Woodley Lane, and Chevy Chase, a great deal, and that its value for taxation is a great deal more now without Rock Creek Park than prior to the time of the Government taking Rock Creek Park, taking the value as a whole?

Mr. SIMS. I have no doubt that that is practically true, but not having examined the tax list before the purchase I can not state exactly how that is. The point I make is to show that these purchases made by the Government were at the urgent solicitations of the citizens of the District, and they then afterwards complained of taking from the taxable area the very identical property they induced the Government to buy. Now, that in the main is perhaps true. But I think before you put a tax burden upon the people of the District of Columbia that the people of the entire District should be consulted in so far as possible, and if they can not be consulted under the present form of government, let us have one by which they can be consulted. It is not right to buy up large areas of property in the District and exempt it from taxation. While it may increase the taxable property right around that particular locality, from that very fact it may draw investment from other sections of the District, and may to a corresponding degree decrease the value of the other sections.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Still in all other cities the cities themselves buy these parks and improve them; and, as I understand, the District does not pay any part of the purchase money for Rock Creek Park.

Mr. SIMS. I can not answer that question.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. But the other cities buy the parks themselves and improve them, while the city of Washington does not.

Mr. SIMS. The point that I am making is that the complaint based upon the fact that we are continually absorbing this property for Government purposes is explained by the fact that they are constantly here importuning us to do so. Now, for the office buildings and the Library, all that has been upon Government initiative, for Government purposes, and the Government ought to share and should share a reasonable part of the operating expenses of the District, at least to the extent that it increases the burdens of the people; but, Mr. Chairman, let us see whether, compared with other cities, the people now are taxed unreasonably in the District.

Mr. JOHNSON. Before the gentleman goes to another branch of the subject, I would like to ask the gentleman if other cities, like New York, Pittsburg, Chicago, do not exempt Government property from taxation, and if the Government puts up its buildings or other improvements our property is taxed there?

Mr. SIMS. Why, absolutely not.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is a great clamor all over this country for us to put up Government buildings, and when they are completed the States exempt them from taxation.

Mr. SIMS. That is true, as the gentleman from South Carolina has said; but it is a fact that the State capital does not require to occupy so large an area of the city in which it is located for State capital purposes as this national capital does in this restricted area of the District of Columbia, so it is not entirely fair to compare this capital city to the capital cities of the States. What kind of a government have we? Let me read to you what a gentleman says who ought to know whereof he speaks. I read from the address of Hon. Henry B. F. Macfarland, president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, in Everybody's Magazine for August, 1901:

> In form, the present government of the District of Columbia is an absolute autocracy, not legally responsible to the people. * * * Nor have the citizens of the District of Columbia the legal right to say who shall exercise the power of a Commissioner, nor how he shall do it, nor for what object. Theoretically, they have no voice in the selection of their servants or of their tasks, and no power to reward or punish them.

Now, again, in an address by the same gentleman, on District day at the Buffalo Exposition, on September 3, 1901, he says this:

> Twenty-three years' experience has proved that this is the ideal form of government for the District of Columbia. * * * The fact that it is an exception to all other governments in the United States, in that it provides for taxation without representation, and is autocratic in form grieves some good people in the District who care more for sentiment than for substance. * * * The government of the District of Columbia is, therefore, admittedly the best in the United States, because it is a government by the best citizens.

Maybe you would like to know who these best citizens are. One is the gentleman from whom I read; the other one is his distinguished associate, Mr. Harry West; the third is a distinguished military officer, Colonel Biddle, aided and assisted by Congress.

Now, this is held up as the best government on earth, because it is an autocracy and because it deprives the people of their right to say whether they shall be taxed or not, and how much. Is that a model of municipal government to hold up to the other cities of the country? Is not that a strange model of a government to be instituted in the city selected as the Federal city by George Washington himself, to represent the institutions of this free constitutional Republic? For seventy-one years they had a municipal government of their own making. Well, here is what it leads to. Those people who have pull and influence with the Senate and the House, those who have pull and influence with the Commissioners have a voice in shaping and running this best municipal government in the United States; and beyond that I am afraid there is very little indeed.

How about taxation? What do you suppose the personal tax in this city is, or what the tax is upon personalty? When I became a member of the District Committee there was, I think, no personal tax, unless you call license fees and such things personal taxes. Through the action of the Committee on Appropriations an amendment passed through Congress taxing tangible personal property, and the whole amount collected last year was about $600,000. Not a dollar in money in the District of Columbia pays a tax; not a share of stock in any company pays any tax; not a bond is taxed.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Are not mortgages taxed?

Mr. SIMS. Nothing but tangible property. Talk about a tax-ridden people, would you not love to exchange your locality for this in that respect? That is what a great many men have done.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Do not the trolley companies and the banks pay taxes?

Mr. SIMS. I will answer as to the street railway companies in a moment.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Do not the banks pay taxes?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. And the gas company and other corporations?

Mr. SIMS. I will answer that in a few moments. But I say that not a share of stock is taxed; not a promissory note is taxed; no form of indebtedness is taxed; cash is not taxed. Gentlemen who have accumulated many millions of dollars in the way of bonds and stock securities have come to the District of Columbia to reap the income from those bonds and give none of it to the people among whom they live. Such men, of course, think this is the ideal government. What could be more ideal than to let them tax the whole country by means of their stocks and bonds and return none of it to the people among whom they live to help bear the burdens of good citizenship?

But show me the newspaper, show me the committee of citizens or the organizations thereof that have ever come to the District Committee at either end of this Capitol or to any other committee and asked us to put a tax upon this character of personal property.

Now, the gentleman has asked me about the street railway companies. I am going to give you some information on that. The street railway companies pay 4 per cent on the gross receipts and a tax upon their real estate ad valorem. That does not mean the tracks; that means the power houses and the stations. I want to say on that subject that here is one of the best operated, best maintained, best equipped electric railway companies in the city of Washington.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. How long does the franchise of this company run?

Mr. SIMS. Until time shall be no more.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Is there any method of changing that 4 per cent on the gross receipts?

Mr. SIMS. There is a method.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Then let us do it.

Mr. SIMS. Every charter of any corporation in the District of Columbia that has ever been granted provides that the act providing for its creation may be altered, amended, or repealed at any time. Now, the Capital Traction Company's annual report, filed recently, shows that it has 40.69 miles of single track, equal to 20.34 of double track in the District of Columbia. I want to say to gentlemen that I have made some investigation as to the cost of construction of electric railways; I mean the cost of reproducing them. The gentleman will remember that this is not all underground trolley, but only the portion in the city; the portion in the suburbs is overhead trolley. We all know that for overhead trolley construction it does not cost anything like that for underground trolley. But for the sake of argument and to be absolutely fair, let us say that it is all underground trolley construction. According to the evidence before our committee heretofore you can reproduce every particle of the property in this company—and I have no feeling against it, for it is a good company and gives good service—you can reproduce every particle of the property at the present high price of materials and labor for less than $4,000,000, or not exceeding that.

What does the company owe? It has a bonded indebtedness of $1,080,000, on which it pays 4 per cent, and the bonds are worth above par. It has $12,000,000 in capital stock. Last year it paid 6 per cent on the capital stock and dividends—$720,000.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Equal to about 20 per cent on the capital stock.

Mr. SIMS. After paying all costs of equipment, construction, operating expenses, compensation, replacement, and otherwise. That stock sold, I see from a quotation on the market to-day, at $1.46, and you can't buy it at all for $1.50. If you can, you will make a good bargain.

The bonds and stock at cash value are to-day worth eighteen and a half million dollars. How much tax did they pay last year? The total tax paid last year was $72,223.87—speaking in round numbers, 40 cents on the hundred dollars of cash value, or 4 mills on the dollar. That is all the taxes they pay. If I am in error, it is because I do not understand the report.

Now, where is there a place in the United States where the total tax upon $100 cash value in any city does not exceed 40 cents? Does this look like overtaxation? Does it look like such a burden that it appeals to the tender mercies of Congress so that you will tax your own people at home to help pay one-half of the street extensions in the city of Washington? Who is to blame? Not the disfranchised people in this District, who have no voice in doing anything in the District. Congress passed this law. There is nothing wrong in the plan of taxing gross receipts if you will make them big enough.

Now, take from the $18,000,000 value $4,000,000, and what does the other $14,000,000 represent? The value of the franchise, which is repealable by Congress any day. Six per cent annually has been paid on the actual value and upon the franchise value. Who does the franchise value belong to?

Well, now, take the other company. This report is got up in such a way that I do not know that I fully understand it. I would be glad to be corrected if I am wrong. The report of the Washington Railway Electric Company says the capital is $15,000,000, paid in. The total amount of bonded debt is $12,617,000. The total cost of the property is $27,519,000. Now, that may not be the correct way of stating it, but that is the way they make their report. The bonds are worth par and over. The preferred stock is eight and a half million dollars and sells at 90 cents. The common stock of six and a half million sells at 40 cents, I believe. The market value, therefore, including bonds and stock, is about $22,000,000. Now, what taxes did this company pay last year? The tax was $43,022.28, as shown in the report. Is not that a wonderfully overtaxed corporation—$43,000 on $22,000,000 of value?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is that 4 per cent on the gross receipts?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; so I am informed.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I understood the gentleman to state that there was nothing paid upon the power houses.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; they pay an ad valorem on that, and that is included in these taxes of the company reported as paid, as I understand it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How is it on the tracks?

Mr. SIMS. That 4 per cent covers that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact under the law that the tracks of this company should be assessed as real estate?

Mr. SIMS. That makes no difference. Take the actual value and put a tax on it that is equal and just, it does not make any difference whether it is in the form of gross receipts or not. They are paying every dollar that this beneficent Congress makes them pay. The people of the District have no power to do anything except ask Congress to do something for them.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If this roadbed and the steel, etc., used in the construction of the railroad becomes part of the realty—and it certainly is then a part of the realty—how can it escape taxation?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman will simply have to read the law of Congress, and then he will see how it is done.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Would it not be a great deal fairer way to tax it on its actual market value?

Mr. SIMS. Yes. But what is anybody in the District going to do about it? They are disfranchised; they have no voice in saying what the burdens should be or who shall bear them or what corporations shall pay.

Mr. YOUNG. Has the gentleman any remedy to propose for this evil?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; but I will propose that later in my remarks. Now, further, let us compare the taxes here with the taxes in other States. Take, for instance, Tennessee. Tennessee taxes lands upon their market value, ascertained for what they would sell, one-third in cash, one-third in one year, and one-third in two years credit, and the whole amount has to go in. Personal property embraces everything, tangible and intangible, with an exemption of $1,000 to each taxpayer. If I have stock in a corporation the corporation is taxed upon the value of the corporation, whatever it may be, either above or below the stock of the corporation, and I, as an individual stockholder, must pay on the stock. You may call it "double taxation," but that is the way they do it there. These millions of dollars of stock in these railway companies which I pointed out to you—because the gentleman asked me about the street railways—costs the individual owners not one cent of taxes.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman tell me whether the steam railroads in the District of Columbia pay any taxes?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; they do, I think; but I have not the amount at my hand now. I am familiar with the street railways, simply because they have been before our committee so often. Now, as to what the banks are taxed, I could not speak. I do not know what it is, and therefore I will not undertake to state. I only speak of these things because I know of them. I am not blaming anybody for paying only 4 per cent on gross receipts. If they were only paying 1 per cent I would not blame them; but the people who own these shares, who live in the District of Columbia, pay not a cent on them, as they are not taxed. The people here pay nothing on bonds, and yet they talk about being a tax-burdened people. Mr. Chairman, I have told the committee about the way the people are taxed and assessed in Tennessee. Everything is included in personal property—notes, mortgages, and choses in action. If I bring a suit in the courts of Tennessee to enforce the collection of a note or to foreclose a mortgage, and it is shown by the defendant that I have not paid the tax upon that note or upon that mortgage, at once I go out of court, I am outlawed, and I have to pay all costs of the suit up to that time, and the court impounds the evidence of debt and assesses me according to law with the penalties and interest, and until I pay I can not go ahead with my suit. But the court can go ahead and collect so much as will be necessary to pay these obligations which I have sought to avoid. Now, when you compare the taxes that the people have to pay here with the taxes that the people have to pay elsewhere, how do you suppose it appears to me that these are a tax-burdened people? I would rather, however, pay the taxes that the people have to in the States than to surrender every right of self-government, as the people here do. The gentleman asked me about the gas company. I can find no report of the gas company to the Government, and I do not know whether it makes one or not. Therefore I can not state what tax it pays. I will only assume that the taxes of the corporations are generally about the same, that the taxes on the real estate are about the same, except, as far as I have investigated, the small property owner pays more in proportion to the market value of his holding that the large property owner does.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. He always does.

Mr. SIMS. But how is he going to help that? The tax assessor is not responsible to the small property owner. He is appointed, and he looks to the appointing power and nowhere else, and the small property owner must pay or leave.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not the electric light and telephone companies doing business in this city pay any taxes, and if so, how much?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, they pay taxes, but as I have not the report here I can not speak exactly. I can not tell about that. But the gentleman asked what my remedy would be. I assume by reason of this being the capital of the United States that there is an additional burden put upon the people they would not have to bear if the capital was not situated here; but on the other hand there is a benefit growing out of that fact which would not exist if the capital was not here. For instance, I do not know whether there would be any city here at all. Georgetown was here in its infancy, but I do not know whether there would be any city at all, and it is not necessary to Washington as a city simply to have these great avenues; but it is very becoming to a national capital, and I think the Government of the United States in every instance where it gets and demands more in the way of maintenance and construction ought to pay a just and reasonable amount, but not half, because if it was equitable to pay half in 1878 with a city now perhaps three times the population it was then, with a board of trade now inviting manufacturing concerns to come into the District of Columbia, what will the taxes be in the future, what will the Government's burdens be if we keep on paying one-half? It will be limited only by the limit of the future, which no man can foresee. Now I say, Mr. Chairman, it is equitable and just that the Government help maintain the great avenues and great thoroughfares that make it distinctively a capital city, but it had better pay taxes on every foot of public property here at the same assessment and the same rate of taxes that the other property does than to go on as it is going.

It looks exceedingly unjust to the people of the District of Columbia that Congress shall with its iron hand say you shall open a certain street, where the damages far exceed the benefits, and then say that the citizen shall pay all of the damages. There has been nothing of that kind done since I have been on the committee. The city government has had to go in debt and borrow money from the National Government on account of street extensions, where the damages far exceeded the benefits. But suppose we do pay one-half of all the damages in excess of the benefits on street-opening propositions? The jurors of the District of Columbia are the people who live here, and naturally the tendency will be, and you can not help it, for we are all human, to make the damage exceed the benefit, especially when only one-half of it is coming out of the city taxpayers and all the rest out of the Government. Now, if some gentlemen or people want a street opened the people of the District know that they have got to pay the excess of damages over benefits. They are thus interested in coming to Congress to defeat the bill, to prevent its passage; but whenever the Government of the United States has to pay one half the other half will be so light and the benefit of the street opening so great that every street-opening proposition will be advocated practically by every man in the city of Washington. Is not that true? Now, to keep it like it is, and require the amount of damages in excess of benefits to be paid by the District of Columbia, will at least be a check upon the opening of streets that are unnecessary, or where they are sought simply to enhance some outlying property. Take Sixteenth street. As shown by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL], the damages exceeded the benefits by over $600,000. Why? A bill was passed through Congress by some means, I do not know what nor how, that those who contributed the land for Sixteenth street should not be assessed for damages.

The District of Columbia to-day is groaning under that burden. That went to the benefit of the individual landowners. Suppose the Government had to pay it. They would all be encouraged, every one of them. Now I say, let us give these people local self-government—municipal government. They had it for seventy-one years, from the time the Government was created. Simply because the Constitution vested jurisdiction in Congress is no reason why they can not have a municipal government, because they have already had it. That form of government was inaugurated almost upon the birth of the Constitution, the birth of the Government itself, and certainly they did understand the limitations intended to be imposed by the jurisdiction of the General Government in this District, which was simply meant to exclude the jurisdiction of the States ceding the land embraced in this District.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Is there any considerable percentage of the population of this city clamoring for a local municipal government?

Mr. SIMS. I want to say, so far as my knowledge goes, all the common people are in favor of it, and none of the so-called "best citizens," referred to by Commissioner Macfarland in the report of his address I have just read, seem to favor it.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Do they want to be burdened with those enormous taxes that confront the citizenship in other cities all over the country? Are they tired of these exemptions from taxes; because there are no citizens in the United States that are not taxed two or three times as much as the property holders are here. Now, do they want a municipality of their own, so as to pay taxes like Chicago, New York, Baltimore, and everywhere else?

Mr. SIMS. I think the large majority, if left to a vote, would say they are in favor of an independent municipal government, regardless of burdens. When this city gets to be one of 500,000 or 1,000,000 population, how are you going to run it through the District committees? Why, every man who has ever served on that committee knows if he gives his duties upon that committee proper attention, he has got to neglect everything else. I came here to represent my constituents, and you come here to represent yours, but you have got to neglect them if you become a representative of the people of the District on that committee. Consequently Members, as a rule, do not, and can not, give their duties on that committee such attention as will thoroughly acquaint them with conditions existing here so as to legislate for the best and most intelligent results. It can not be done. From the very nature of things it is impossible. This was foreseen when the present form of government was created—I mean the act of 1878—and was not intended to be permanent. Why should you or I pay for the education of the children of the District? They do not pay to educate yours. We are taxed to educate our own children. Another thing: By reason of depriving these people of self-government, and governing through Congress, every reformer, real or imaginary, sane or insane, practical or impracticable, or crank is trying to help to shape legislation for this District. They come here by letters, by petitions, and in person from every direction. They want to tell us how to have the best sanitation here, how to have the best school laws, how to do everything better than we do; while the people of the District of Columbia seem to have no more voice than the most distant constituents of any Member of the House.

Why, we have a school bill in this committee, and through the patience and patriotism of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] hearings were given to people who never had and never will have a child in the schools of the District of Columbia. Patiently, much time has been given to people from outside of the District of Columbia by Mr. MORRELL's subcommittee—much more than those in it—in order to tell them just what to do with the public schools of this District. The people ought to pay their public school taxes and run their public or common schools in their own way, as they do in Tennessee, in Kentucky, and all of the States, so far as my knowledge goes. It is impracticable to properly govern the city through Congress as it is done now through its committees. The ever-increasing burden of the Government demands that we should give them self-government as a matter of interest to the United States and to the people of this District as a matter of right and justice. Home rule should be in practice in every city of the United States, in every State and every Territory. Every platform I can remember, of either national party, for a long time has demanded that appointments in the Territories should be made from people who live in the Territories.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Suppose the General Government should want to open up an avenue for public purposes, and we should have that independent municipal government that you are talking about, and there should be a conflict between Congress and the municipal government. Would not that involve much confusion?

Mr. SIMS. Congress will always be supreme under the Constitution.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Congress should always exercise paramount authority?

Mr. SIMS. It should be supreme, but I have gone off from the line I wanted to discuss. Where do the officers to run the District government or the judges to sit in the District courts come from? I am not going to criticise the present Administration specially, or any other Administration, for they have all done alike. You are a lawyer. Suppose you were born and brought up in the District of Columbia. You are an able lawyer; you have studied the judicial system of the District, and you are acquainted with the people and their institutions. There is a vacancy in one of the courts. Will you be appointed? Possibly; not probably. A man from some State will be appointed—perhaps a man who can not longer be elected to the United States Senate or House of Representatives by the votes of his own people will be installed in the District of Columbia as a judge to determine and try the rights of the people here, to whom he has no allegiance nor ever can have.

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have many times asked that we pass some sort of civil-service law applicable to the District of Columbia. We do not do it, and the Commissioners necessarily can not do otherwise than appoint many people to office simply because Senators and Representatives urge it and ask for it. They appoint many people who are not citizens of the District, who are brought here from the States to give them an opportunity to educate themselves or to do something else.

Where is there a city in the Union that would stand anything like that? If the majority of the people in this District do not want any other form of government, if they want to continue to be decitizenized, I am willing that they should go on; not willing either, but less unwilling. But I think this capital city should be a model of republican institutions as well as a model of boulevards and buildings. When a foreigner comes here, a philosopher, teacher, or great thinker, show him the streets and buildings, show him everything except a disfranchised citizenship. If you do that he will not go home thinking any better of republican institutions as administered in the seat of government of the greatest Republic on the face of the earth.

I have no criticism to make of the present Commissioners. They are doing as well as they can. They are living under limitations. Why, suppose you want to get a report here as to whether any particular regulation is working well or not. Where are you going to get it? You must get it from officers who are appointed, and they always try to please the appointing power. We try to please our appointing power. Our constituents appoint us. We listen to their voice, and the people here who are appointed to municipal office listen to the voice of the power that appoints them.

I do not want to take up any further time. The House has been very patient; but this amendment ought to be stricken out, as a prevention of the unnecessary opening of streets, as a check against it; put the burden on the whole people of the District of Columbia, or those who pay taxes. I ought not to say the whole people.

Another thing about taxation here. There is no poll tax, no kind of a capitation tax. That, I suppose, is just. When you politically decapitate them or, as a gentleman sitting by me says, dehorn them, I suppose they ought not to pay a head tax. But other people, who live where they have independence and manhood and wills of their own, do have to pay a poll or capitation tax.

While I fully appreciate the weight of the argument made by the distinguished gentleman whose letter I include, and the argument made by Mr. Theodore W. Noyes, and made by many other distinguished people, they are taxed without their consent, taxed without representation. We, the Congress, voted to give to two railroad companies some $3,000,000 in cash, one-half of which had to be paid by the District of Columbia, and not a citizen was ever consulted about it. The people of the District of Columbia were loaded with an obligation, a pure contribution to two great railroad companies, and the people could not open their mouths. They must pay it. I do not blame them for dodging taxes. I do not blame them for wanting the least possible burden of taxes, because the burden is put on them without their consent. But let them rise up like men. They are perhaps the best average of citizenship in the United States, so far as intelligence goes. Let them demand that they have a share in their own government, and then let us give it to them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I should like to ask my friend a question.

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. This relates to another matter. My observation has been that out on the edge of town the streets are smooth and well paved and have very few, if any, holes in them, while right down in the heart of the town, on Pennsylvania avenue, there are a great many holes in the pavement. I should like to know why the streets are worse in the heart of the town than out on the edge?

Mr. SIMS. Of course, the Commissioners have charge of all that. Why some pavements are better than others is a question I can not answer.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. On Pennsylvania avenue I noticed a dozen holes inside a radius of 20 yards.

Mr. SIMS. They are hampered by another committee in the House. They can not get appropriations except as the Committee on Appropriations give them. It may be that they can not make all the necessary improvements because of lack of money.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They certainly ought to stop the holes in the central part of the city first.

Mr. SIMS. I am afraid my friend is most interested in the holes in the streets nearest to him. That is the way it is with most of us.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. OLMSTED having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 17359) making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. TELLER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 20. An act to change and fix the time for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the middle district of Tennessee; in the southern division of the eastern district of Tennessee, at Chattanooga, and the northeastern division of the eastern district of Tennessee at Greeneville, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 22.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be made an examination and survey of Long Cove, the approach thereto, Cape Jellison Harbor and the waters leading thereto, between Cape Jellison and Sears Island, Penobscot Bay, Maine.

CONDEMNATION OF LAND FOR STREETS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] such time as he desires.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that some of the gentlemen who have participated in discussing the subject to-day and on other occasions have an improper conception of this capital city, of the purposes of the Government in establishing it, and in its government. We have this city of Washington because of this section of the Constitution:

To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such District (not exceeding 10 miles square) as may by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States.

It was not the purpose of those who framed this Government to establish the capital at any of the cities then existing. There were, perhaps, reasons for that that came to them from across the Atlantic. It was the purpose of the fathers to have a new location, to have a city entirely under the control of the Government that should be a Federal city. It has never been the policy of this Government to strive to make it a manufacturing city or a commercial city or to make it anything else than a Federal city—the seat of government.

Every man that comes to this city comes with the full knowledge of that fact—that he is not to exercise the same rights of citizenship and to participate to the same extent in self-government here that under the Constitution and laws he might in other localities. But when he comes here he comes voluntarily, surrendering that portion of the rights that in another locality he might have. He recognizes the fact that it is within the power of the Federal Government to make the government of this city what it chooses to make it; and when that is understood it seems to me very much of the difficulty that is in the minds of gentlemen ought to be removed.

The General Government has made this city what it is. When we began participation in equal parts in meeting the expenditures of the city it was a mere, meager, unkempt, undesirable country town. It is the expenditure of the Federal Government that has made it the most beautiful of cities. Until now, under this law it is an asylum, in a large degree, for gentlemen of large means who want to avoid the full measure of taxation that would belong to them and fall upon them in other localities. Our laws are peculiar. I believe that the government in this city for the purpose for which it was intended—a Federal city—is the best that can be devised. I speak of the system. I am not an admirer of the administration. I do not believe that two newspaper men and an Army officer are the three best men that could be selected to administer a government like this.

I take a great pride in the oratorical abilities, so frequently displayed in all parts of the country, of these gentlemen that now control the destinies of this city, under the law, but I would appreciate very much higher that administrative ability that would give to the people decent streets than I do this higher measure of oratory so often exemplified.

Mr. FASSETT. In the northeast.

Mr. HEPBURN. No; I would not say in the northeast, but the streets are everywhere disagreeable and unworthy of this great capital city, and not at all in harmony with the large sums that are from time to time appropriated.

Now, Mr. Chairman, whenever there is an extension of the streets in this city its benefit comes not to the people of the whole country who have pride in the Federal city, but it is in the interest of certain particular gentlemen. It is, to my mind, entirely proper that these gentlemen should meet the full expense of such extension. There is no man who has been here for a long time but what knows scores of men that have accumulated large wealth through the opening of the streets.

It is a very extensive and remunerative industry in this city, and you will find many localities, many streets paved, with sewers, with lights, extending out into the country that have not been utilized for the location of homes on their borders. There are streets enough now, if they were compactly built upon, to meet the expansion of the population that will probably be here during the next twenty years; but gentlemen want, in order to make available their outlying property, the power to locate highways. It is right that they should have them, but it is also right that they should meet the expenses, and not the people in distant parts of the country be compelled to contribute.

While I am speaking of the matter, in reply to suggestions I have often heard here that these people are overtaxed, I want to suggest that, in my judgment, there is not a city in the Union where property escapes taxation to anything like the same extent as here. The personal property is almost entirely exempt, undervaluation of property bringing the 1½ per cent of rate down to, in my belief, less than three-quarters of 1 per cent upon a full and fair valuation.

I know of properties here that are assessed at less than one-third of the price that the owner asks for them. I know of properties here that the Government has acquired title to recently and has been compelled to pay under appraisement similar to those authorized in this bill three times the assessed value, and if the price at which the Government was compelled to pay for them is a fair value, then that property was taxed only 50 cents on the $100. Where do you find such taxation anywhere else? Yet there is always complaint about the burdens imposed upon the people of this city by the United States. I take as much pride in this capital city as any other man. My people feel that they have an interest in it, because it is the capital city, and they do not object to legitimate expenditures for its adornment. They want it to be the most beautiful capital in the world, as I believe it is destined to be, but at the same time they feel that the people here should bear their full proportion of the expenditure.

On a 25 per cent valuation of the property, the people in the town where I now live pay 79 mills, a rate equal to nearly 2 per cent upon the actual value. The farm lands of the county in which I live pay at least 1½ per cent upon the valuation of the farms. Therefore I think that these clamors about the rights of the people here to self-government and to the impositions that are put upon the taxpayers of this city are all unwarranted and unjust. They have no foundation in fact. I do not like that provision in this bill which requires that the Government of the United States should pay any portion of the sums that may be required to secure street extension. If for no other reason, I think it ought to be borne by the citizens of this District for the reason that the assessments are made by the citizens of this District. I do not want a new incentive on their part for the spoliation of the Federal Government. I think the fact of the expenses paid by the Federal Government often induces additional and unjust valuations to be made that would not be made or would not be tolerated by the people of the city if it were known that the people of this District alone had to bear the burdens that are imposed. Therefore I think that is a most unjust provision in this bill, and I hope that it will be rejected. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GREENE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On March 28:

H. J. Res. 117. Joint resolution extending the time for opening to public entry the unallotted lands on the ceded portion of the Shoshone or Wind River Indian Reservation in Wyoming;

H. R. 15583. An act to authorize the Madison Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River in St. Francis County, Ark., at or near the town of Madison, in said county and State; and

H. R. 15848. An act authorizing the sale of timber on the Jicarilla Apache Indian Reservation for the benefit of the Indians belonging thereto.

On March 29:

H. R. 12845. An act to consolidate the city of South McAlester and the town of McAlester, in the Indian Territory.

On March 30:

H. R. 13842. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Eastern Star Home for the District of Columbia," approved March 10, 1902;

H. J. Res. 127. Joint resolution to correct abuses in the public printing and to provide for the allotment of cost of certain documents and reports; and

H. J. Res. 128. Joint resolution to prevent unnecessary printing and binding and to correct evils in the present method of distribution of public documents.

On March 31:

H. R. 125. An act regulating the retent on contracts with the District of Columbia;

H. R. 4463. An act to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;"

H. R. 4470. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1895;

H. R. 14467. An act for the relief of Maj. George E. Pickett, paymaster, United States Army; and

H. R. 14813. An act to amend an act approved March 1, 1905, entitled "An act to amend section 4 of an act entitled 'An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia;' approved February 28, 1901."

On April 2:

H. R. 6216. An act granting an increase of pension to Stephen D. Hopkins; and

H. J. Res. 11. Joint resolution for the publication of eulogies delivered in Congress on Hon. John W. Cranford, late a Representative in Congress.

On April 3, 1906:

H. R. 5954. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue duplicate gold certificate, in lieu of one lost, to Lincoln National Bank, of Lincoln, Ill.

On April 5, 1906:

H. R. 14808. An act to authorize the Choctawhatchee Power Company to erect a dam in Dale County, Ala.; and

H. R. 16671. An act permitting the building of a dam across the St. Joseph River near the village of Berrien Springs, Berrien County, Mich.

CONDEMNATION OF LAND FOR STREETS.

The committee resumed its session.

[Mr. OLCOTT addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I call for the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901, be, and the same is hereby, amended by incorporating therein the following, to be known as "subchapter 1 of chapter 15."

CONDEMNATION OF LAND FOR STREETS.

SEC. 491a. Whenever land is needed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the opening, extension, widening, or straightening of any street, avenue, road, or highway in the District of Columbia, authorized by Congress, the said Commissioners may institute, in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, sitting as a district court, by petition, a proceeding in rem for the condemnation of the land needed.

With the following amendments:

In lines 9 and 10 strike out the words "by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia;" and in line 1, page 2, after the word "Commissioners," insert the words "of the District of Columbia."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 491c. The said court shall cause public notice of not less than twenty days to be given of the institution of such proceeding, by advertisement in three daily newspapers published in the District of Columbia, which notice shall warn and require all persons having any interest in the proceeding to appear in court at a day to be named in said notice, and to continue in attendance until the court shall have made its final order ratifying and confirming the award of damages and the assessment of benefits by the jury herein provided for; and in addition to such public notice said court shall cause a copy of said notice to be served by the United States marshal for the District of Columbia, or his deputies, upon such owners of the fee of the land to be condemned as can be found by said marshal or his deputies within the District of Columbia, and upon the tenants and occupants of the same.

With the following amendments:

In line 25, on page 2, and in lines 1 and 2, page 3, add the words "the said court shall appoint a guardian ad litem for any person interested in the proceedings who may be under disability."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I renew the motion which I made to strike out, in line 22, page 2, the words "of the fee."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 22, after the word "owners' strike out the words "of the fee."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 491d. After the return of the marshal and the filing of proof of publication of the notice provided for in the preceding section said court shall cause a jury of five experienced, judicious, disinterested men, who shall be freeholders within the District of Columbia, not related to any person interested in the proceeding and not in the service or employment of the District of Columbia or of the United States, to be summoned by said marshal, to which jury the court shall administer an oath or affirmation that they are not interested in any manner in the land to be condemned, and are not related to the parties interested therein, and that they will, without favor or partiality, and to the best of their judgment, ascertain the damages each owner of land to be taken may sustain by reason of the opening, extension, widening, or straightening of said street, avenue, road, or highway, and the condemnation of the land needed for the purpose thereof, and to assess the benefits resulting therefrom as hereinafter provided.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman who has charge of this bill what property will be taken into account when a highway or a street is being opened—only those parts that are touched, immediately affected by the opening, or will those parts somewhat remote be affected?

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] I would state that section 491d expressly provides that the jury shall assess benefits against the abutting lands and also may determine all other lots, pieces, or parcels of land which they shall conclude will be benefited by the opening. The jury has the right to determine other lots than those immediately abutting that will be benefited by the proceedings.

Mr. HEPBURN. So that it might be possible to take into account all of the lots that would be upon a block, for instance, although not immediately abutting upon the street?

Mr. OLCOTT. That was so expressly provided in section 491d.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I find in this section 491d, in line 5, that the jury is to be composed of "five experienced, judicious, and disinterested men." Five is a jury. In the next paragraph, line 6, I find that the majority of them—that is, a majority of the jury of five; that is, three or four of the five men—can go along and take a man's property, which is permissible, I believe, under the adjudications of the Supreme Court. Now, I want to reaffirm my protest.

Mr. OLCOTT. In answering the gentleman's question, I would say it is true a majority can determine, but the finding of the jury must be confirmed and ratified by the court, and the party whose property is taken has the right to appeal, and a new jury can be had if he is not satisfied, and until a final ratification and confirmation by the court the property can not be physically and absolutely taken.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where do you find that in the bill?

Mr. OLCOTT. The provision is made for an appeal from the district court to the circuit court of the District, and a motion can also be made to set aside and vacate the award of the jury, in which case the judge of the district court appoints an entirely new jury to take the matter up for consideration.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many are there on that jury?

Mr. OLCOTT. Five again.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Five again? Now, Mr. Chairman, away back in the history of the District of Columbia we had a regular jury of twelve men, no more and no less, and if I mistake not the history of one of the cases, the jury—a majority of them—undertook to return a verdict, and on appeal the verdict was set aside because the whole jury had not agreed. While I yield to the gentleman that under the adjudications you can have this jury of five, but if there is any wisdom in twelve in trying an ordinary damage suit for cutting off a man's leg or when you dig down the grade of a street or when you pull down a man's house, I do not see the wisdom, Mr. Chairman, of having a jury of five, with three or four to agree practically, when the verdict of that jury is to take the fee for the land or take the owner's entire right. He is entirely dispossessed. Mr. Chairman, I simply rose for the purpose of again reannouncing the safe and serious proposition that when a man's property to taken under the Stars and Stripes that it ought to be taken by the old-fashioned jury of twelve men, "no more and no less." There is a mysterious wisdom, as it were, in twelve jurors, and we have clung to it, and every State, certainly in the South, I believe, and almost throughout the country, have with unremitting devotion clung to the jury of twelve, and to quote Judge Harlan's words in one of our District cases here, with which the Chair is perfectly familiar—the Callan case, and the Thompson case from Utah, and in a series of cases—he uses the words "twelve jurors, no more and no less;" and I do not see, Mr. Chairman, the wisdom of having five jurors taking the property under the law of eminent domain from the widow and the orphan or the rich man or where the man has a little hut, which is all he has, nevertheless it is his, for if we ourselves would preserve the spirit of our institutions, we should give the citizen the benefit of all the wisdom there is or can be about the old-fashioned jury of twelve, no more and no less.

Mr. SIMS. May I suggest to my friend this is not a constitutional jury?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand it is an appraisement board, but you call it a jury; but you may call it a bumblebee or a mocking bird or what not—it simply goes and takes a man's piece of property and hands him so much money, and he must take that or he gets nothing. You can call that a jury, or you can call it what you please. I tell you whenever that is done it will crush out one of the most righteous and one of the soundest principles of the Constitution that ever throbbed in that sacred instrument.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words more—say about three minutes—in order to answer the question of my colleague here.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask my colleague and friend from Tennessee if it is not the fact in Tennessee we have only three to five for a similar purpose?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The fact they do wrong in my State at a time when I can not control in doing that wrong and making the wrongdoers do right does not teach me here to do what I think is wrong, or fail to do something which, I might say, would make my friend and colleague and the balance of us do right.

Mr. SIMS. I will say further, Mr. Chairman, this does not disturb the right of trial by jury.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. My friend from New York stated to me a few moments ago it was the same little jury of five.

Mr. SIMS. You are mistaken. I said the court could set aside the first finding and appoint another jury, and upon the finding of that jury you can appeal to the court and have a jury of twelve.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is that mentioned particularly in the bill? Where is that in the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON. It is in the law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman know that it is in the law?

Mr. JOHNSON. It is in the general law of the District.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am satisfied I am not going to convince this committee that it is doing this wrong, for it has been doing it so long it has almost become a part of the political condition of Congress. Now, my friend from New York to my left [Mr. FITZGERALD] says on this appeal it is still a jury of five. Why, gentlemen, why do you trench on that old bulwark of American liberty, of twelve jurors, no more and no less? Why will you continue to do that when you know in your sober judgment in your own State in the trial of any other kind of cases you demand a jury of twelve in the circuit or trial courts? Mr. Chairman, while I dislike to discuss the question, I have whenever I have had the opportunity for a number of years declared that it is part of my religion, and next to the best part of it, to preserve the integrity of a "jury of twelve, no more no less," when a man's property is to be taken away from him, whether he is black or white, no matter whether the property taken is a mansion or a humble log cabin, they ought to have a jury of twelve. Then I say if there is any virtue in a jury of twelve there is only five-twelfths in five. I protest, Mr. Chairman, against this invasion of the principle that hovers around a jury of twelve men, no more no less.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 12, page 3, after the word "condemned," insert "or in land within a proposed area of assessment for benefits, which shall be prepared and submitted to the court with the petition."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides that when a jury has been selected the court shall then administer an oath or affirmation that they are not interested in any manner in the land to be condemned. This amendment provides that this oath shall be administered to them, that they shall not be interested in any land within the proposed area of assessment, and that the proposed area of assessment shall be prepared and submitted with the petition by whoever initiates the proceeding. The object of the amendment is very clear. It is not rare that persons other than those who own the land to be condemned are assessed for benefits, and under this proposed law, as it stands, the owner of adjacent property, which necessarily would be assesed for benefits, could sit on the jury, and in that way there would be no doubt that the damages would always exceed the assessment for benefit.

Mr. OLCOTT. I will say to the gentleman from New York that it is perfectly impossible to attempt to determine what the area will be, and make a juror swear that in some circumscribed area the land to be opened up does not secure any improvements.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, in ordinary street openings it is well known by experience that property within at least a certain distance will be assessed for benefits. Why should not the engineer's office, in making out its plats of the land to be condemned, also, as done in the practice with which the gentleman from New York is familiar, make out the proposed area of assessments, and that nobody owning land within that district should sit as a juror.

In appointing the jurors this proposed law does not prevent freeholders within a very restricted area of the land to be condemned from sitting on the jury to assess the damages for benefits. There may be a great tract of land on a street to be opened—not through the land, but along the land—and under this bill the owner of that tract, which necessarily would be assessed for a large portion of the benefits—the owner of that land could sit on this jury and determine how much his land should be assessed for those benefits. If the gentleman prefers, let him put in here that no owner within a certain distance of the land to be condemned shall sit on the jury; but surely some provision should be here to prevent the owner of property that necessarily should pay a part of the burden from determining how much his property should bear of the burden.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I will say in regard to the statement of the gentleman from New York that there is provision in this bill for the removal of any juryman upon proof to the judge that he is not a proper person. The jury determines the area of assessment. In view of the fact that the judge has such absolute control of the jury and can remove a juror upon objection to him, I am disinclined to accept the amendment of my friend from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to call the attention of my colleague to this fact: A tract of land may be owned by a corporation, and a stockholder in that corporation or a member of any owning syndicate might be summoned to sit on this jury, and unless he were examined in advance, it would be impossible to determine the fact at any time that he had an interest in the land. I hope the committee will adopt this amendment.

Mr. OLCOTT. I call for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will my friend from New York, who has the bill in charge, show me where in the bill there is provision for a jury of twelve and for an appeal on the merits of the case? Does the case go up on its merits, or simply on pure questions of law?

Mr. OLCOTT. The gentleman has asked me to point out pretty nearly all the sections of the bill. The first question I think he asked is relative to the jury, and that is found in section 491e.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am trying to find out where you give the right of appeal, to try the case on its merits before a jury of twelve.

Mr. OLCOTT. We do not give any right to try before a jury of twelve. It is a jury of five. We merely allow, upon objections being filed within twenty days after the return of the verdict, an appeal to be taken from the judge of the district court to the circuit court. We have first given the right to the judge of the district court to vacate and set aside the findings of the first jury.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. OLCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. SULZER. I should like the gentleman from New York to tell us the necessity for this great innovation upon the law. Why should a man's property be taken away from him without just compensation or without legal proceedings or without giving him his day in court? I believe this bill in its present form is unconstitutional.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, my colleague from New York is, by virtue of a series of questions, putting in the RECORD his well-known ideas on all subjects that affect the people. But let me say in regard to that——

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman tell us why he wants to make this great change in the present law?

Mr. OLCOTT. The gentleman from New York knows perfectly well that in the city which he honors there is a provision for condemnation proceedings in street openings, and for a hearing by a commission of three. I have no doubt the gentleman has frequently served as one of those commissioners.

Mr. SULZER. I beg to correct the gentleman. I never was appointed on a commission and never served as a commissioner in one of these preceedings in the city of New York.

Mr. OLCOTT. I presume that the people of the State of New York are holding the gentleman for nomination to the highest honor in the gift of the people of that State. But I will say that there is no innovation in this. In every State of the Union, so far as I know, there are similar proceedings to this one that we are trying to enact into law to-day. In some States I know they have seven on the jury, and in some States I think they have nine, but I think the number never exceeds nine. In the State of New York, as I say, the number of commissioners is three, and they try the case without the presence of a judge.

Mr. SULZER. There is the right, however, of appeal to the courts.

Mr. BABCOCK. If the gentleman from New York will yield to me, this is not a new provision. It is one that has been worked under here in the District for fifteen years, and I would ask the gentleman from New York or the gentleman from Tennessee to cite one single case where an injustice has been done under this law. This is merely a putting on the statute book in general form of laws that have been passed by this House more than fifty times; yes, more than a hundred times.

Mr. SULZER. Did not several people from the District of Columbia appear before your committee and protest against this bill?

Mr. BABCOCK. No, sir; not a man, not a soul.

Mr. SULZER. Well, several people are objecting to it now.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I desire to reply to my friend's question.

Mr. BABCOCK. Just wait a minute.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman has asked a question.

Mr. BABCOCK. Just wait a minute. Let me answer the gentleman from New York. Not only was there not a soul appeared against this bill, but every man who has had to do with these proceedings—the judges, the Commissioners, the District officers—have all commended this bill in the very highest terms. They say "That is right, put it on the statute books. That is what we want."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask the indulgence of the committee that I may have two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that he may address the committee for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan that I do not know of any injustice——

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I want to know who the gentleman is talking to. I have great regard for the State of Michigan, but I don't want to be called a Michigander. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Mr. Chairman, my colleague a few minutes ago said that we had the same kind of law as this in Tennessee. I take issue with the gentleman unless this bill allows a final trial on the merits in a court and before a jury of twelve. As to the number of jurors composing the jury of view my recollection is not clear.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, Mr. Chairman, right there. The gentleman from Tennessee, a distinguished lawyer, comes here and talks about his "recollection" in regard to legal matters. We want to know the facts. Doesn't the gentleman know whether the jury is composed of ten or twelve or fourteen?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will wait a moment, that is exactly what I am going to do. The gentleman is anxious for information, but gives me no chance to give it. My recollection as to the jury of view is not clear. It may be five, but the litigants can agree to this under the statute. But I am sure the right of appeal to the circuit court or a trial de novo before a jury of twelve is always allowed. There the court and a jury of twelve act—exactly the kind of a law I have fought for here for several years. I recall a noted case, Alloway v. Nashville. A jury of view appointed or was agreed on allowed about $9,000 for land to be used for a reservoir site. An appeal was taken and a trial de novo had, and a jury of twelve in the circuit court allowed about $12,000 damages or compensation, and the Supreme Court affirmed the latter finding, the landowner appealing from each verdict. But when a court and twelve jurors passed on the facts, their judgment "stuck." This was a full, fair, and wide open constitutional chance for both sides to set up their rights. That is what I want. No man's property should be taken without the solemn verdict of twelve men, and the laws of Tennessee gave it to him. That is the kind of law we have in Tennessee, where we respect not only the Constitution, but the vital principles of it and the sacred rights of property.

Mr. BABCOCK. But the gentleman from Tennessee has not told us the number that constituted the condemnation jury. [Laughter.]

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 491e. The court, before accepting the jury, shall hear any objections that may be made to any member thereof, and shall have full power and authority to pass upon any such objections, and to excuse any juror or cause any vacancy in the jury, when empaneled, to be filled; and after the jury shall have been organized and shall have viewed and examined the land and premises affected by the condemnation proceeding they shall proceed, in the presence of the court, to hear and receive such evidence as may be offered or submitted on behalf of the District of Columbia and by any person or persons having any interest in the proceeding. When the hearing is concluded, the jury, or a majority of them, shall return to the court, in writing, their verdict, setting forth the amount found to be due and awarded to the owners of the land to be condemned as damages by reasons of said opening, extension, widening, or straightening of said street, avenue, road, or highway, under the provisions hereof, and the lots, pieces, or parcels of land benefited by said opening, extension, widening, or straightening, and the amounts of the assessments for the benefits against the same.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out in line 6, page 4, the words "or a majority of them."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 6, strike out the words "or a majority of them."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I say in all candor, and with all the seriousness with which I can speak, that if there is any virtue in one juror, there is twelve times as much in twelve jurors. If there is any virtue in three men, there is more in five men. Yet three can take property under this law. If there is any virtue in five men, we should not trench upon it and make it less possible to have all the wisdom of the five. There should be twelve jurors to take away the property of any man, and he should have always the right of challenge.

Mr. OLCOTT. The committee, Mr. Chairman, is unwilling to accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 491g. That of the amount found to be due and awarded as damages for and in respect of the land to be condemned for said opening, extension, widening, or straightening, plus the costs and expenses of the proceeding, such amount shall be assessed by the jury as benefits, and to the extent of such benefits against the lots, pieces, or parcels of land on each side of the street, avenue, road, or highway to be opened, extended, widened, or straightened, and against any and all other lots, pieces, or parcels of land which the jury may find will be benefited by the opening, extension, widening, or straightening, as the jury may find said lots, pieces, or parcels of land will be benefited; and in determining the amounts to be assessed against said lots, pieces, or parcels of land the jury shall take into consideration the respective situations and topographical conditions of said lots, pieces, or parcels of land, and the benefits and advantages they may severally receive from the opening, extension, widening, or straightening of the street, avenue, total amount of the assessments for benefits, such excess shall be road, or highway. If the total amount of the damages awarded by the jury and the costs and expenses of the proceedings be in excess of the total amount of the assesments for benefits, such excess shall beborne and paid equally by the United States and the District of Columbia.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend line 20, page 5, by striking out the word "equal" and the words "United States and the;" so that it will read "and paid by the District of Columbia."

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 16, strike out, after the word "highway," all down to and including the word "Columbia," in line 21, and substitute the following: "Hereafter no streets shall be opened unless the amount of the assessment of benefits shall equal the amount of damages."

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, in the different investigations I have made concerning the opening of streets in the District of Columbia my attention has been particularly called to the assessment of benefits. Bills have been presented and passed, each specifically requiring that the amount of benefits should equal the amount of damages. There have been instances—not one, but several—where that has been absolutely disregarded by the jury—or, I might say, the finding of the jury disregarded under the discretionary power given the Commissioners—with the result that the excess of damages has been put upon the taxpayers at large of the District.

Now, we are framing a general law—a law that is to take the place as far as possible of special legislation. Therefore, to my mind, we ought to have a provision which will prevent indiscriminate opening of streets simply for the benefit of speculators in property, and that no street should hereafter be opened except where the necessity is so great that the assessment of benefits would equal the assessed damages. If it becomes necessary that the Government should have a street opened, then we can have a special act passed for that purpose, but I think it is very unwise, as we are now passing a general law, that there should not be a provision in it such as is embodied in my amendment—namely, that no street shall hereafter be opened unless the amount of assessment for benefits shall equal the amount of damages assessed.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I will say, in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL], that if a provision of that character is put in this general law it might prevent the city of Washington condemning land for the purpose of creating any wide boulevards. We can easily imagine a condition of affairs where one of the streets will be widened for the purpose almost entirely of beautifying the city at a cost largely in excess of the benefit to abutting property owners. I hope the gentleman will not press the amendment.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest merely that the question raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] raises a judicial, not a legislative, question. Congress can not possibly anticipate the terms, conditions, and circumstances under which a proceeding of this nature should hereafter be instituted. It is a question to be addressed to the court, not to the legislative department of the Government.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a word. I am in full accord with the statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT]. Now, there are no two cases that are alike. In four out of five of the bills passed by Congress provision is made that the benefits assessed shall equal the damages awarded, but, as my colleague from New York [Mr. OLCOTT] says, there may be a case of a wide boulevard, or a condition where you take 75 per cent of a man's lot or something of that kind where it would absolutely nullify this act; and what this committee is seeking to do is to put something on the statute books that will be simple, that will be equitable, that will be just, and easily worked out by the courts.

Now, I desire to say here in explanation, that three of the ablest members of the District Committee have spent three months on this bill with the officials of the Government and the District Commissioners and all interested, and I believe that this is as near a perfect measure as a bill can be. I think that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] would be a dangerous one, and I believe that if the gentleman himself would give it careful consideration, under the cases I could call to his attention now, that he would withdraw the amendment and not ask for a vote upon it.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman who are most benefited in these wide boulevards which have been referred to? Is not the abutting property enhanced in value in proportion with the width of the street?

Mr. BABCOCK. I would say to the gentleman that as a rule the general public is benefited by the opening of a wide boulevard. We have had a condition in a special bill, that the gentleman well knows of, in which Sixteenth street was the subject of consideration. That was an unjust measure. That was pressed through as an amendment on another bill, whereby the people were permitted under that bill to donate the right of way through valuable property and thus be relieved from assessments for benefits, putting the burden on the District. We seek to avoid any such thing as that.

Mr. MORRELL. That is just exactly what I am seeking to avoid. In that case of Sixteenth street, which the chairman has mentioned, there were damages to the extent of $729,952, and all the benefits that were assessed were $108,000. In other words, there was a difference of $600,000 which came out of the pockets of the taxpayers of the District of Columbia, in spite of the fact that the bill specifically stated that the damage should equal the amount of assessment for benefits.

Mr. BABCOCK. That bill did not state that.

Mr. MORRELL. Oh, yes; it did.

Mr. BABCOCK. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. That bill provided that the people who came in and donated a right of way should be relieved of any assessment for benefits, and in the case of that street the tracts of land were benefited many hundreds of thousands of dollars, and the value of donations only a few thousand dollars. It was an unjust measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has precedence, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee being in the nature of a substitute. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the Clerk again report the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I understood the Chair to say that the first amendment to be voted on will be the one offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

The CHAIRMAN. That is the statement of the Chair.

Mr. MADDEN. I had the impression the first one would be the one offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in the nature of a substitute, and under the rules it is in order first to perfect the text by acting upon such amendments as may be proposed before acting upon a proposed substitute.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a statement for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to make a brief statement. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BABCOCK. The proposed Sims amendment does this: It provides that the District shall bear the entire burden of any street opening that Congress may see fit to order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption right there? My impression is the Sims amendment provides that the District of Columbia shall pay merely the amount of damages in excess of the benefits that accrue to the abutting property owners.

Mr. BABCOCK. Oh, certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. For that reason I am in favor of it.

Mr. BABCOCK. The Sims amendment relieves the General Government from contributing any part to the expense of street openings.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; I will state it does not relieve the General Government, because there is no obligation on the part of the General Government to pay any part of the expense now, but it prevents saddling on the General Government that obligation.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. As I understand it, under existing law, as it has been held for many years, the expense of extending streets, aside from the benefits, has been paid wholly by the District. The bill you have here before the committee provides for the Government paying half of it, so that, in place of this being a question of whether we are going to saddle the whole expense on the District, it is a question of whether we are to saddle half the expense that has always been borne by the District on the Government of the United States. Is not that a true statement?

Mr. BABCOCK. Well, the gentleman's statement is all right, but he has too many "saddles" in it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I used the gentleman's own expression.

Mr. BABCOCK. No; the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee used the word "saddle." Now, let me make this clear. Heretofore, in most of the bills—in all the bills practically that have been passed lately—we have provided that the benefits must equal the damages or else the street would not be opened. In that case neither the District nor the General Government would be called to pay anything. In a number of street-opening bills passed in previous Congresses provision was made that not less than one-half of the amount of damages should be assessed as benefits, the excess of damages over the benefits to be borne by the District. Now, this bill provides that excess of damages over benefits shall be paid one-half by the General Government and one-half by the District, and there is no "saddle" in it at all.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I would like, Mr. Chairman, to ask the gentleman one more question.

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Is it not a fact that on a bill in the last Congress that the gentleman from Wisconsin had before the House, on a report of a committee of conference this very question arose, and this House has repeatedly voted that this cost of extending streets shall be paid by the District of Columbia and no part by the United States?

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman is absolutely correct, as he most always is.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SIMS. I simply wish to say the amendment has been so thoroughly explained by the three gentlemen who have just spoken that I will not take up any time further to explain it.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TAWNEY. Can we have that reported?

Mr. MORRELL. Will the Chair have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 491b. The said court shall appoint a guardian ad litem for any person interested in the proceeding who may be under disability, and to hear and determine any objections or exceptions that may be filed to the verdict of the jury and to vacate and set said verdict aside, in whole or in part, when satisfied that it is unjust or unreasonable, in which event the court shall cause a new jury of five experienced, judicious, disinterested men, who shall be freeholders in the District of Columbia, not related to any person interested in the proceeding and not in the service or employment of the District of Columbia or of the United States, to be summoned, who shall proceed to ascertain the damages or assess the benefits, or both, as the case may be, in respect of the land as to which the verdict may be vacated, as in the case of the first jury: Provided, That if vacated in part, the residue of the verdict as to the land condemned or assessed shall not be affected thereby: And provided further, That the objections or exceptions to the verdict shall be filed within twenty days after the return of the verdict to the court.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Page 5, strike out all commencing with the word "The," in line 22, down to and including the word "to," in line 24, and insert in lieu thereof the words "The said court shall."

Page 5, line 25, strike out the word "the" and insert the word "any."

Page 6, line 1, insert after the word "and" the words "shall have power;" also strike out the word "said" and insert the word "any."

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4911. When the court shall have finally ratified and confirmed the verdict of the jury and condemned the land needed for the opening, extension, widening, or straightening of the street, avenue, road, or highway, the amounts of money found to be due and awarded to the owners of the land condemned shall be paid to such owners by the disbursing officer of the District of Columbia from moneys advanced to him by the Secretary of the Treasury, upon requisitions of the Commissioners of said District, as provided by law.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Page 6, line 18, strike out the word "the" where it appears before the word "jury" and insert "a;" also strike out the words "and condemned" and insert in lieu thereof the word "condemning."

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment in line 15, page 8, striking out the first "of."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 15, page 8, strike out the word "of;" so it will read "any of the owners, etc."

The amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. OLCOTT, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRUMPACKER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 17217, had made sundry amendments thereto, and had instructed him to report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any of the amendments? If not, they will be considered in gross.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. OLCOTT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CHILD LABOR IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. BABCOCK. I now present for consideration the bill (H. R. 17838) to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve the point of order that this bill is improperly on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This bill provides a charge upon the Treasury, and it should be upon the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of order, as the Chair understands, to the last section.

Mr. FITZGERALD. On page 7.

The SPEAKER. Section 10.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

The SPEAKER (reading):

SEC. 10. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to appoint two inspectors to carry out the provisions and purposes of this act, at a compensation not exceeding $2,100 per annum.

The Chair will hear the gentleman upon this point of order.

Mr. MORRELL. I would say, Mr. Speaker, in discussing the point of order raised by the gentleman from New York, that this provision in section 10 does not specifically appropriate any money. That is done by the Appropriation Committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the rule is that if a bill directly or indirectly makes a charge on the Treasury it should be on the Union Calendar, and it is not necessary that the bill should appropriate the money.

Mr. MORRELL. Well, then, Mr. Speaker, I move that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. MORRELL. I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say, on the point of order, that the Chair understands the gentleman from New York makes the point of order that this bill should be on the Union Calendar. The Chair will sustain the point of order. Now the gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House, under the five-minute rule. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman intend to permit discussion and an opportunity to amend, if it is desired?

Mr. MORRELL. To amend the bill? Oh, certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the rules of the House every single Member has a right to offer any amendment to this bill if the rule be insisted on. Now, unless the gentleman from Pennsylvania assures the House that he will yield to any Member who desires to offer an amendment, I shall object to his request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that if the bill is considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, it would be read by paragraphs as in Committee of the Whole for amendments under the five-minute rule.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will proceed to read the bill by sections.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That no child under 14 years of age, if employed by day, and no child under 16 years of age, if employed by night, shall be employed, permitted, or suffered to work in any of the establishments or occupations named in sections 1 and 2 unless the person or corporation employing him procures and keeps on file and accessible to the inspectors authorized by this act and the truant officers of the District of Columbia an age and schooling certificate, and keeps two complete lists of all such children employed therein, one on file and one conspicuously posted in the building in which such children are employed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting some information. I wish to know how many truant officers there are in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORRELL. I am not absolutely sure in regard to the question of number. I think there are two or four.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, which?

Mr. MORRELL. I say I am unable to answer the gentleman whether there are two or four. Perhaps, being on the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman may remember.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I supposed that the gentleman reporting this bill would know, because the line provides in addition to the truant officers of the District that two inspectors provided by this act shall perform the duties. What I desire to know is, why it is necessary to create two new places in the District of Columbia. My experience on the Committee on Appropriations has led me to the belief that there is no very great necessity for increasing the employees in the District of Columbia; and unless the gentleman in charge of the bill can give some very good reason for these two inspectors I shall move to strike out of this bill all reference to these inspectors, so that it can be ascertained whether it will not be possible for the truant officers already authorized to perform the duties imposed by this act.

Mr. MORRELL. In answer to the gentleman, I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, the bill for compulsory education also puts additional duties upon truant officers, and it was considered necessary by the committee, which gave the bill very careful consideration, heard testimony in regard to it, spent many hours listening to argument as to what was necessary to make the law effective; and, after considering these matters, we decided that two inspectors at the small salary of $1,000 were necessary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. One thousand two hundred dollars, the bill provides.

Mr. MORRELL. I accept the correction, and I sincerely trust that the gentleman will realize that we would not want to put in these inspectors unless it was deemed absolutely necessary by the committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Can the gentleman state how many of these truant officers there are, so that the House may be able to judge whether the committee's opinion was well grounded or not?

Mr. MORRELL. I have been informed by a gentleman near me that there are not, as we were informed, any truant officers, but probation officers who, with the officers of the board of children's guardians, perform truant duties, and it was therefore necessary to provide for these inspectors to properly carry out the provisions of the bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MORRELL. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Are there any truant officers now employed in the District of Columbia?

Mr. MORRELL. Not as such.

Mr. TAWNEY. Whether they are employed as such, are there any District employees charged with the ordinary duties that pertain to truant officers?

Mr. MORRELL. No, sir; there are not.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is there any officer or employee who is charged with the duty of looking after children who do not attend school regularly?

Mr. MORRELL. There is a board of children's guardians.

This board exercises the only supervision that there is over children in the District.

Mr. TAWNEY. We recently passed a juvenile-court bill?

Mr. MORRELL. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. It provides for a number of officers who are to look after children.

Mr. MORRELL. We provided for two, a man and a woman.

Mr. TAWNEY. And you have provided here for two inspectors?

Mr. MORRELL. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. If there is any necessity at all for an officer of this kind, do you think two inspectors could cover this city effectively?

Mr. MORRELL. The committee did not want to be extravagant in what they suggested in the bill, but they thought, particularly as the doing away with child labor in the District of Columbia was a new proposition, that these officers would be sufficient to carry out the purposes of the bill; but if they were not found sufficient, why, then, after a trial had been given them additional ones could be provided.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the nature of the duties of these inspectors that they should be paid $1,200 a year?

Mr. MORRELL. They are to visit the places where children are employed and see that they are not employed in violation of the provisions of the act. They are to look the children over, to inspect their school certificates, to see whether the provisions of this bill are being carried out, and then if they find violations to report them.

Mr. GRAHAM. As I understand these officials are to take the place of the factory inspectors in Pennsylvania?

Mr. MORRELL. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM. We have factory inspectors in the State of Pennsylvania who perform similar duties.

Mr. MORRELL. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move to strike out, in lines 12 and 13, the words "the inspectors authorized by this act." I wish to say a word or two about that, and then the gentleman can reply.

Mr. MORRELL. If that amendment should prevail, it would practically make the provisions of this bill of no effect. If you have a law providing that certain things shall be done and certain abuses corrected, unless you have somebody who is actually detailed to see whether the provisions of the law are carried out the law at once becomes of no effect.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman's committee a few days ago reported a bill to increase the salaries of policemen. I should like to ask him if the policemen can not see that this law is enforced?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should like to give my reasons for this amendment, and then the gentleman from Pennsylvania may oppose it if he wishes.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I should like to ask one question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is taking up my time.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggest that I first offered a pro forma amendment, and now I offer an amendment to strike out certain words in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Precisely; but the time of the gentleman opposing the pro forma amendment has not expired. As soon as it does, the gentleman from New York can be recognized.

Mr. SULZER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York, my colleague, have five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has now expired. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, in lines 12 and 13, strike out the words "the inspectors authorized by this act."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have moved to strike out the language "the inspectors authorized by this act." I also intend to move to strike out the section authorizing the two inspectors to be appointed by the Commissioners.

I had hoped that the gentleman reporting this bill would be able to inform the House how many officers would be authorized to enforce the provisions of this act. My recollection is—I may be in error, but the committee reporting the bill evidently has no better information—my information is that there are three truant officers now authorized by law. Whoever is familiar with legislation to prevent child labor knows that the time when inspectors are most necessary is during the vacation months of the year. The three truant officers have nothing to do during the vacation period, so that with the inspectors authorized by this bill, during the time when inspectors are necessary to enforce this act, there will be five inspectors available. This bill, if it becomes a law, will go into effect before the summer vacation, and the truant officers now authorized by law will be available for this work. If, after the summer vacation is ended, between that time and the assembling of Congress, it is found that the truant officers can not do this work, it will be an easy matter to set forth the reasons to Congress at that time, and to obtain whatever additional help is necessary.

My experience is that there are a number of inspectors in the District government obtained in just this way, upon bills creating new duties, which could very will be cut off from the pay roll, without any harmful effect on the District government; and I hope that the House will at least give the three truant officers, now performing not very onerous duties, an opportunity to demonstrate whether they can perform the work outlined in this proposed legislation before they authorize the additional inspectors provided in this bill.

I say after careful investigation that I am convinced that the best thing this House can do is to go very slowly in authorizing new employees in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. May I suggest to the gentleman the fact that in creating the juvenile court we have given authority to appoint two additional probation officers to assist the gentlemen in doing this very work?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I thank the gentleman from Indiana. The law which has just gone into effect provides for a probation officer at $1,500 a year and an assistant at $900 a year.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is it not also a fact that the places where these children will be employed are in the factories and in the stores—large establishments here in the city—and that policemen of the city are constantly present during the working hours in such places, and would it not be competent, as a part of their duty, to see that this law is, as all other laws are, enforced in their immediate district, and could not the policemen report any violation to the proper prosecuting authorities, which they might find in their respective districts?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not only that; if this law be enacted, the proprietors of these establishments will exercise, as they do in all other places, the utmost care in requiring these certificates to be furnished before they will employ children below the proper age, and the number of places in the District of Columbia is very small where the violations would take place. It is not a great manufacturing place, it is not a great commercial city, and to put on two additional inspectors at this time is absolutely indefensible.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I am informed by the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations that there are no such officers in the District as truant officers. Now, I am perfectly willing, in view of that information, to apologize for having been wrongly informed, and I am willing in view of that information to have the words "truant officers" stricken out.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MORRELL. But I do think that to strike out the provision which provides for the inspector, and thereby absolutely take away the life of this bill, would be an act of folly. The legislation then, particularly if there are no truant officers, becomes null and void, and I am quite sure that my friend from New York will not want to go on record as being opposed to a bill for the protection of child labor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that I am not trying to take the life out of the biil. I am only trying to cut off the unnecessary patronage that is created in the bill.

Mr. MORRELL. Let me ask the gentleman a question. If the inspectors are done away with, then the only two officers that can possibly perform the duties are the probation officers attached to the juvenile court.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Three truant officers.

Mr. MORRELL. Attached to the juvenile court.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; they are not attached to the juvenile court; the two probation officers are only attached to the court.

Mr. MORRELL. But there are no truant officers, as I have just stated to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why does the gentleman put truant officers in his bill if there are none? My recollection is that there are three truant officers.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman can not have heard what I have just said, that I was just informed by the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations that there were no truant officers in the District, and I apoligized to the gentleman for putting in the bill something in regard to which I was misinformed. Now, I am quite willing to have the words "truant officers" taken out of the bill, but, as I say, I can not subscribe to having the inspectors taken out of the bill, which would practically make the bill of no effect.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the gentleman that if his information is so inaccurate, it would be much better to move to recommit his bill until he could find out what the provisions in it mean and why they are there.

Mr. BABCOCK. The information comes from the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My recollection has been confirmed by a member of the District Committee, who states that he recalls in the hearings before the gentleman's committee it was stated that there were three truant officers; so, under this conflicting recollection of different Members, I would suggest that it would be better to take back this bill and let the gentleman reporting it find out accurately what the facts are.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman referred to was probably, like myself, misinformed, and therefore I think that the criticisms of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] are a little severe, and perhaps more severe than he intends to make them, for the reason that this committee gave a great deal of time to listening to all of the evidence that was brought before the members of the committee in regard to the provisions of this bill. The committee has not acted hastily in the matter, and when the provision for truant officers was put in the bill we were informed that there were such officers.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORRELL. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would ask if the gentleman's committee considered the advisability of imposing specifically on the policemen the duty of inquiring as to whether or not this law was or was not obeyed by the citizens of the District?

Mr. MORRELL. I will say, in answer to the gentleman, that the committee went into that very thoroughly.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman has recently reported and passed a bill here increasing the salaries of policemen of this city. Why could they not discharge this duty in conjunction with their regular duties as policemen?

Mr. MORRELL. For the reason, Mr. Speaker, that in every case where that was suggested by the committee to those who came before the committee and who were thoroughly acquainted with the child-labor proposition, they said that wherever it had been tried it had proved absolutely useless, that the policemen had other duties to attend to, and that they were often persuaded for this or the other reason not to make the report as full as it should be; it was for that reason that those two officers, as I said before, were put into the bill, and I sincerely trust the committee will allow them to remain.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. The gentleman has no time in which to yield to the gentleman from Illinois, but the gentleman from Illinois may be recognized in his own time.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I believe that there are already employed by the District three truant officers, and in addition thereto there are two juvenile-court officers, whose duty it is to look after the character of work sought to be imposed on the inspectors which are to be provided for in this bill. It seems to me that with the small number of children between the ages of 14 and 16 to be employed in the institutions of the District these five men would be amply able to do all the supervisory work required. The creation of the two additional places simply places an additional expense upon the taxpayers of the District and upon the Federal Government.

The disposition of the District government is, as I have discovered from a very careful investigation, to increase the number of men employed regardless of whether or not they are necessary. It seems to me, therefore, that we can not be too careful in our efforts to prevent an extravagant management of the affairs of the District. If the truant officers are qualified to do the work of inspection required under this bill, then surely there is no need for the employment of further inspectors, and I sincerely hope that the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will prevail. I notice too, Mr. Speaker, that the first section of the bill provides that no one shall be employed during the day who is less than 14 years of age, and that no one less than 16 years of age shall be employed during the night; but in the third section of the bill it says that if children less than 14 years of age are employed, or that if children less than 16 years of age are employed, the inspectors shall have jurisdiction. These two sections seem to be in conflict.

Mr. SULZER. Would it not be better to make the limit 16 years all around?

Mr. MADDEN. Sixteen years it seems to me is an age before which no child should be allowed to be employed anywhere.

Mr. SULZER. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], and I would like to see this bill amended so that the age would be made 16 years.

Mr. MADDEN. Not only in the factories and in the workshops of the District of Columbia, but on the floor of this House. I believe that no child who ought to be at school should be employed here.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I do.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Would the gentleman object to a boy carrying newspapers after school hours before he was 16 years of age?

Mr. MADDEN. I would object to the employment of any child of less than 16 years of age during school hours.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I mean would you object to his carrying newspapers after school hours?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is what the committee had in mind when that provision was drawn.

Mr. MADDEN. It does not make itself very clear to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 12 and 13, strike out "the inspectors authorized by this act and."

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 10, noes 35.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That an age and schooling certificate shall be approved only by the superintendent of public schools, or by a person authorized by him, in writing, who shall have authority to administer the oath provided for therein, but no fee shall be charged therefor.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word to get some information about this bill. Will the gentleman in charge of the bill inform me whether a man, for instance, who runs a mercantile establishment may, after school hours, employ one of his own children to assist him about the institution?

Mr. MORRELL. Well, I should think, Mr. Speaker, in answer to that question, that in view of the provisions of this bill that would be in the discretion of the parent of the child.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It would be in the discretion of the parent, the gentleman says. This bill, it seems to me, substitutes government in large measure for the proper and legitimate functions of parentage. We have gone almost everywhere with government, but it seems to me that this bill carries it a little beyond what is reasonable. I want to know whether the parent could require his own child under 14 years of age to do certain errands and certain kinds of proper work after school hours?

Mr. MORRELL. In answer to the gentleman I do not think it was the intention of the bill to be as drastic as that in any way, shape, or form. I might say in regard to the general proposition of child labor that there are to-day in forty-one States of the Union child-labor legislation, and that we are just following on in the order which has been adopted in those States.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That may be true enough, but it does not alter the character of this kind of legislation. This section takes away from the parent and vests in the school superintendent the power to issue school certificates and age certificates. It practically takes away all control the parent has over the child in certain lines.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit me to suggest the matter is exactly in line of the legislation we are enacting now for the control of families in the District of Columbia?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. True, as the gentleman has said, but there is too much government in this country, altogether too much government. I believe, as a rule, it is better for children to be properly employed, even children under the age of 16 years, than to be idle. I believe that proper laws ought to be enacted to prevent the abuse of chidren under 16 years of age and of chidren under 21 years of age, for that matter, in factories and sweat shops, but I do not believe that the Government ought to practically supersede the fathers and mothers of the country in the direction and control of their children, and I do not know where we are going to stop. If we establish government in the home and appoint inspection officers to look after the children, and superintendents of schools and other public functionaries to act as guardians for them, and bestow upon those functionaries the absolute and exclusive power of deciding when and where they shall be employed, of issuing certificates respecting age, date of birth, and education, I have wondered what the end will be, and how much of filial gratitude there will be upon the part of the young man when he reaches his majority and knows that the father and the mother that gave him life reared and educated him under compulsion of law and under the espionage of official inspectors, truant officers, and other agents of the Government.

I believe it is going altogether beyond anything that is required to correct the abuses that are practiced in factories, sweat shops, and mercantile institutions of the country. This section requires a certificate of age and of school attendance to be made, not by the father, not by the mother, not by the guardian, but by the superintendent of the school. I think it is wrong. I am in favor of the right kind of a law to prevent the employment of children of tender years in hard and hurtful service, but I say this, that idleness brings more injury, more harm to the boys and girls of the country as a rule than wholesome employment. We can do more harm in legislating indolence and idleness into the youths of the country than we can do good by unwisely making the law supersede the natural duties of parentage. Children should not be abused in any manner, and they should be protected against any kind of labor that retards their proper growth, either mentally, morally, or physically, but the natural control of the parent over the child should not be taken away except where the public good imperatively demands it.

Mr. MORRELL. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Speaker, that the law in Indiana does not allow girls to do any work under the age of 18, and boys under the age of 16 years, under the child-labor law in Indiana, which is very much like the bill submitted.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I find that this bill prohibits the working of boys under the age of 14 and girls under the age of 16. Perhaps I misunderstood the gentleman. He says that the law of Indiana prohibits the working of boys under the age of 16 and girls under 18.

Mr. MORRELL. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I did not know we had such age limits in the State of Indiana, but there is no occasion for that kind of legislation in the District of Columbia, where there are no industries of any importance.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is in favor of child labor in the District of Columbia?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The right kind of labor.

Mr. SULZER. What do you call the right kind?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Doing proper services for their mothers and fathers when school is not in session.

Mr. SULZER. They can do that anywhere.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana withdraw the pro forma amendment?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That whoever employs a child or whoever having under his or her control a child and permits such child to be employed, in violation of sections 1, 2, 3, or 9 of this act, shall, for such offense, be fined not more than $50; and whoever continues to employ any child in violation of any of said sections of this act, after being notified by an inspector authorized by this act, or a truant officer of the District of Columbia, shall, for every day thereafter that such employment continues, be fined not less than one nor more than twenty dollars. A failure to produce to an inspector authorized by this act, or a truant officer of the District of Columbia, an age or schooling certificate or list required by this act shall be prima facie evidence of illegal employment of any person whose age and schooling certificate is not produced or whose name is not so listed. Any corporation or employer failing to produce an age or schooling certificate in violation of section 5 of this act shall be fined not less than five nor more than twenty dollars. Every person authorized to sign the certificate prescribed by section 5 of this act who knowingly certifies to any false statement therein shall be fined not more than $50.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question about two provisions that I do not understand and that seem to be in conflict. On page 5, line 10, the bill provides "a failure to produce to an inspector authorized by this act or a truant officer of the District of Columbia an age or schooling certificate or list required by this act shall be prima facie evidence of illegal employment," etc. Then, in lines 15, 16, 17, and 18, it says: "Any corporation or employer failing to produce an age or schooling certificate in violation of section 5 of this act shall be fined not less than $5 nor more than $20." I do not understand how in one instance it shall be prima facie proof of guilt, and in the next few lines the failure shall be sufficient to warrant the imposition of a fine.

Mr. MORRELL. Why, the first paragraph is what shall constitute guilt.

Mr. TAWNEY. Prima facie evidence.

Mr. MORRELL. Prima facie evidence.

Mr. TAWNEY. And the other conclusive.

Mr. MORRELL. And the other provides the penalty.

Mr. SHERLEY. In one instance it provides that it is prima facie evidence and the other the failure to produce is sufficient to incur the penalty. It does seem, from reading it hastily, that you are making here rules of evidence that are in conflict.

Mr. MORRELL. That was the thought of the committee. If the gentleman thinks it too strong, why the committee will be glad to receive any suggestions that he might make in the shape of an amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have simply glanced at it; but it did seem so crude to me that I thought there must be some explanation why it should be in this form.

Mr. MORRELL. That was the thought of the committee that framed the bill, and they put in these words.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit a suggestion, it seems to me that lines 15 to 18 should be stricken out and in lieu thereof simply put in a provision saying that any person convicted of a violation of the foregoing provision shall be fined such an amount. As it is now it is unintelligible.

Mr. SIMS. Would it not be better to strike out that provision commencing in line 10:

A failure to produce to an inspector by this act, or a truant officer of the District of Columbia, an age or schooling certificate required by this act shall be prima facie evidence of the illegal employment of a person whose age and schooling certificate is not produced or whose age is not so listed.

It will be better to strike that out and leave the other in.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; for this reason: You are making a failure to produce that in evidence absolutely conclusive as to a person's guilt; and you would make it much too drastic. What you ought to do is to strike out the lines making a beginning with the word "any," in line 15, down to the conclusion of the sentence.

Mr. MORRELL. Will the gentleman offer his amendment so that the committee can hear it?

Mr. SHERLEY. If you will give me a minute; or we can return to this paragraph with the understanding that I have an opportunity to offer an amendment.

Mr. MORRELL. Yes. I will ask the Clerk to read.

The SPEAKER. One moment. As the Chair understands, section 7 is passed without prejudice and with the right to return. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That inspectors authorized by this act and the truant officers of the District of Columbia shall visit the factories, workshops, mercantile establishments, stores, business offices, telegraph offices, restaurants, hotels, apartment houses, clubs, theaters, halls, and bowling alleys in the District of Columbia and ascertain whether any minors are employed therein contrary to the provisions of this act, and they shall report any cases of such illegal employment to the superintendent of public schools and the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia. Inspectors authorized by this act and the truant officers of the District of Columbia shall require that the age, schooling certificates, and lists of minors employed as specified in this section shall be produced for their inspection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to section 8.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 8, page 6, line 1, after the word "alleys," by adding the words "and the Senate and House of Representatives."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, if there be any necessity for limiting the age of boys who are to be employed in the factories, stores, and workshops, that necessity exists equally as to those who are employed in the Senate and the House of Representatives. I believe that every boy less than 16 years of age ought to be in school, and I am firmly convinced that many of the children on the floor of this House ought to be under the guardianship of their parents or the guardianship of some one else rather than to be here. There is no reason why this law should not apply with equal force to children in every kind of employment in the District if it is a good law.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, the committee propose to accept the amendment of the gentleman.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to go back to section 2, to ask to include employment in the House and Senate in that section.

Mr. MORRELL. I ask unanimous consent that permission be granted to do that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, line 9, after the word "alley," insert "or the Senate or House of Representatives."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to appoint two inspectors to carry out the purpose of this act, at a compensation not exceeding $1,200 per annum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the word "two," in line 1, page 7, and to insert the word "one."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 7, line 1, strike out the word "two" and insert the word "one."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this is not a very drastic amendment. It provides for one inspector instead of two. The report of the committee itself calls attention to the fact that this legislation is preventive rather than remedial, because the opportunity for the use of child labor in the District of Columbia is minimized by the fact that there are few mills and factories and no mines within the District. If more than one inspector is required, it will be very easy to provide for the additional ones required at the next session of Congress. This amendment only takes one inspector from the bill; and I repeat that I am convinced, from an examination of the appropriation bill for the District, that there are many inspectors provided for different purposes in just this way who are absolutely unnecessary for the proper administration of the District Government. I have no interest in this except I believe that the District Committee has not shown the necessity for two inspectors for this purpose, and I hope the House will at least cut off one of those proposed.

Mr. MORRELL. I trust that the amendment of the gentleman will not be agreed to.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for a vote.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 7, noes 20.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggest that we should have more Members to legislate, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to withhold for a moment his point of no quorum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will withdraw it if gentlemen will get up and vote this unnecessary inspector out of the bill.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman to withdraw his point for a moment.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] is anxious to make an arrangement about the debate on the Post-Office appropriation bill. Of course that can not be done in the absence of a quorum.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, my attention was diverted for the moment. If the gentleman will withhold his point, I ask unanimous consent that the House meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow and on Wednesday for the purpose of continuing the general debate on the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the House meet at 11 o'clock on to-morrow and on Wednesday for the purpose of continuing the general debate on the Post-Office appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SPANISH CLAIMS COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

There is herewith transmitted, for the information of the Congress, a communication from the president of the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission relative to the progress and condition of the business of that Commission. From this report it is clearly apparent that the work of the Commission is proceeding with due care and reasonable expedition. The Spanish Government is now courteously furnishing the evidence from its archives and officials which is indispensable to give complete information concerning the transactions upon which the claims before the Commission are founded.

I recommend the passage of a law limiting and fixing the fees of attorneys in cases where awards are made in favor of claimants; and also that the question whether a right of review by the Supreme Court of the decisions of the Commission should be given by means of writs of certiorari be decided at the present session of Congress.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 9, 1906.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WEBBER, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for twenty days, on account of sickness in family.

Mr. BRADLEY, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for one week, on account of illness in his family.

CHILD LABOR IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The yeas are 7 and the nays are 29. The noes have it, and the amendment is rejected. Section 7 was passed with the privilege of returning to the same.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out, on page 5, line 15, the words beginning with the word "any" and ending with the word "dollars" in line 18.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, lines 15 to 18, strike out the words "any corporation or employee failing to produce an age or schooling certificate, in violation of section 5 of this act, will be fined not less than $5 nor more than $20."

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, we accept that amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. Beginning at line 18, it says "every person authorized to sign the certificate prescribed by section 5 of this act, who knowingly certifies to any false statement therein shall be fined not more than $50." Now, section 5 does not authorize anybody to sign a certificate.

Mr. MORRELL. I think it does.

Mr. OLMSTED. Whom?

Mr. MORRELL. Section 5 says that—

An age and schooling certificate will not be approved unless satisfactory evidence is furnished by duly attested transcript of the certificate of birth or baptism of such child, or other religious record, or the register of birth or the affidavit of the parents or guardian or custodian of a child——

Mr. OLMSTED. Whose certificate is that?—— which affidavit must be taken before the officer issuing the employment certificate, who is hereby authorized and required to administer such oath, and who shall not demand or receive a fee therefor.

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes; it says that no age or school certificate shall be approved, except under certain conditions, and it provides who may take the affidavit of the parents if the certificate is not produced, but it does not authorize anybody to make the certificate, and consequently the penalty in section 7 does not apply to anybody. It does not state who is authorized to make the certificate from the register of birth or from any other religious record.

Mr. MORRELL. It would be the superintendent of schools or whoever issues the certificate, and then follow the provisions of the certificate.

Mr. OLMSTED. I merely wish to call attention to the fact that there is nothing in section 5 that authorizes anybody to make the certificate, therefore the penalty will not hurt anybody.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MORRELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

GREAT COUNCIL OF IMPROVED ORDER OF RED MEN.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration for the bill (S. 3292) to incorporate the Great Council of the United States of the Improved Order of Red Men.

The SPEAKER. This bill was reported at a prior session.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 10480. An act for the relief of certain settlers upon land within the indemnity limits of the present St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway Company.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 5521. An act to authorize the Tyronza Central Railroad Company to construct a bridge across Little River in the State of Arkansas.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate concurrent resolution was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 22:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be made an examination and survey of Long Cove, the approach thereto, Cape Jellison Harbor and the waters leading thereto, between Cape Jellison and Sears Island, Penobscot Bay, Maine—

To the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 8891. An act granting an increase of pension to Josephine Rogers;

H. R. 13151. An act granting an increase of pension to Christopher C. Harlan;

H. R. 12286. An act granting relief to the estate of James Staley, deceased; and

H. R. 11026. An act to authorize the counties of Holmes and Washington to construct a bridge across Yazoo River, Mississippi.

THE EDES HOME.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 4046) to incorporate the Edes Home, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That George L. Nicolson, Albion K. Parris, R. Douglas Simms, Robert D. Weaver, Archibald Greenlees, Edward F. Looker, and George A. King, all residents of that portion of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, which, on the 10th day of February, A. D. 1895, constituted the city of Georgetown, in the said District, and their successors, from the aforesaid portion of the said city of Washington, to be supplied in the manner hereinafter directed, be, and they are hereby, created and declared to be a body politic and corporate in the District of Columbia, by the name, style, and title of "The Edes Home," and by that name to have perpetual succession, to contract and be contracted with, to sue and be sued, to implead and be impleaded, and to erect and forever maintain and support, in the said portion of the said city of Washington, a home for aged and indigent widows residing, or to reside, within the said portion of the said city of Washington; and the said home shall be forever exempt from the control of any particular religious sect or persuasion.

SEC. 2. That the said corporation may acquire, take, receive, invest, reinvest, and dispose of property of every nature whatever for the use and benefit of the said home, and all property held by the said corporation for such use and benefit shall, while and as long as so held, be free from any tax, burden, or assessment, laid or to be laid by the United States or under any authority emanating therefrom.

SEC. 3. That the said corporation shall have power to adopt a common seal, and to break and alter the same at pleasure; to supply vacancies occurring in the membership of the said corporation from male persons residing or to reside within the said portion of the said city of Washington; to appoint a president, secretary, treasurer, and such other officers as the said corporation may deem necessary, and define the duties and fix the compensations or emoluments of such president, secretary, treasurer, and other officers; to determine how many and what particular persons of those qualified for admission into the said home shall be actually received therein; to exclude at pleasure from said home any person who shall have been admitted thereto as an inmate thereof; to make, ordain, establish, and execute all such ordinances and by-laws, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, as the said corporation may deem needful in the interests of the said home; and to provide for the abrogation, alteration, or amendment of any of said ordinances or by-laws, whether by a majority, for the time being, of the members of the said corporation or by a fixed number or proportion exceeding a majority of the whole number of members of which the said corporation may lawfully consist, but the provision in such latter case shall itself be first adopted by the like fixed number or proportion exceeding a majority of the whole number of members of which the said corporation may lawfully exist.

SEC. 4. That the said corporation shall cause to be printed and published on three successive days, Sunday exclusive, of the month of May in each and every year, in some morning newspaper printed and published in the said city of Washington and possessing the largest or next largest general circulation therein, a true and correct statement, under the seal of the said corporation and attested by the signatures of the majority, for the time being, of the members of the said corporation, setting forth the number of widows residing in the said home, as free inmates thereof, at the date of such statement, and the number departed therefrom, through death or other cause, since the publication of any next previous like statement by the said corporation; the real estate belonging unto the said corporation, and the approximate value thereof; the approximate aggregate value of all stocks, bonds, notes, or other choses in action owned by the said corporation; the amount of cash held by the said corporation at the date of the statement; the total receipts, as well as the total disbursements of the said company since the publication of any next previous like statement by the said corporation, and the total outstanding liabilities of the said corporation.

SEC. 5. That in case the said corporation shall fail or neglect to cause to be printed and published such statement aforesaid in manner aforesaid, then, upon every such failure or neglect, each and every member of the said corporation consenting to or conniving at such failure or neglect shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than twenty nor more than two hundred dollars. And in case the said corporation, its members, officers, or agents shall cause to be printed and published in any newspaper any false or fraudulent representation touching any of the particulars required to be embraced in such true and correct statement aforesaid, every member, officer, or agent of the said corporation knowingly consenting either to the fabrication and concoction of such false or fraudulent statement or to the printing or publication thereof shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars or be imprisoned in some penitentiary for not less than one year nor more than five years, or both, at the discretion of the trial court.

SEC. 6. That this act shall be and remain at all times subject to repeal, alteration, or amendment by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment on behalf of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 9, page 2, strike out the comma and insert a period; and strike out lines 10 and 11, down to and including the word "held," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The property held by said corporation actually and exclusively used and occupied for the home provided for in section 1 of this act shall, so long as said property is so exclusively used and occupied."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what reason there is for this special act of legislation?

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I would say in regard to that matter that the property that is to establish this home for the benefit of widows was left by a resident of Georgetown. It seems that the general law does not provide for the filing of any reports by corporations of this character, and the executors of the will whereby this money was left determined that they ask for the formation of a corporation that would be under the direct supervision of the Government and whose special charter would compel the filing of certificates of annual reports, so that any disturbances as to the principal funds——

Mr. SHERLEY. Why did not the committee see fit to amend the general law? If it is a good thing to have annual reports of institutions of this kind, why did not the committee amend the general law?

Mr. OLCOTT. I have no doubt that such a bill will be offered later.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, how much is the estate, I would ask the gentleman from New York, that is to be incorporated?

Mr. OLCOTT. The residuary estate is $225,000.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. OLCOTT. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, this is another one of those bills where we are called upon here in the House on the moment to grant articles of incorporation to a company. What are the powers that we give to that company? Nobody can understand, in the manner they are passed here, what powers we are conferring upon that corporation. I, for one, am opposed to this, as I have been opposed heretofore to all other grants of this kind. What may be contained in the provisions of this bill nobody can tell, and how much we may hereafter be embarrassed by what we do now in this respect no man can foresee.

All incorporations ought to be granted in the strictest and most guarded manner. All of our State legislatures have seen proper to adopt general laws containing many wise provisions for the regulation of corporations, and requiring that every corporation having a charter shall conform to the general standard; but here in Congress we simply take hold of the crank and grind them out by the thousands, according to the whim or the judgment of the particular person who drafts the bill. Somebody wants to give a grandiloquent title to a corporation of some character, and he or she hunts up a Member of Congress, and the bill is introduced granting a special charter which differs from others, so that there is no standard. There is doubt in my mind as to whether the proper limitations are contained in these charters, and what we shall find ourselves subsequently involved in, as I said a while ago, no man can tell. Whatever is to be done ought to be done according to a general standard. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope that this bill will fail.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this bill ought not to be passed without an opportunity for some debate, such an opportunity as we are not to have at this time of the day.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, they are waiting for the building—the executors.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I think they can wait a couple of weeks longer.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Would it be in order to move to adjourn at this time?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a response to the inquiry of the House as to expenses of the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission and the amount of payments under awards—to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for the construction of a sea wall at Fort Screven, Ga.—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Y., praying for the enactment of legislation to restrict immigration; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. PENROSE presented a memorial of McKees Rocks Division, No. 201, Order of Railway Conductors, of McKees Rocks, Pa., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "Hepburn railroad rate bill;" which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the Village Improvement Association, of Doylestown; of the Woman's Culture Club of Connellsville; of Harmonia Circle, of Lebanon, and of the Teachers' Club of Carlisle, all in the State of Pennsylvania, and of the Wheaton Club, of New York City, N. Y., praying that an appropriation be made for a scientific investigation into the industrial conditions of women in the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented petitions of Mountain Echo Council, No. 134, of Hazleton; of Barbara Fritchie Council, No. 84, of Shenandoah, and of Colonel T. M. Bayne Council, No. 103, of Bellevue, all of the Daughters of Liberty, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation to restrict immigration; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. DILLINGHAM presented petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Danville, of John S. Brown, of Brattleboro, and of W. G. Eastman, of Washington, all in the State of Vermont, praying for the enactment of legislation to remove the duty on denaturized alcohol; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of the Woman's Club of White River Junction; of the Shakespeare Club, of Lyndonville; of the Woman's Club of Brattleboro; of the Woman's Club of Lyndonville, and of the Progressive Club, of Rutland, all in the State of Vermont, praying that an appropriation be made for a scientific investigation into the industrial conditions of women in the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BURKETT presented petitions of sundry citizens of White Cloud, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to authorize the issue of patents in fee simple to the allottees of the Sac and Fox Indians in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Santee, Nebr., praying for the enactment of legislation to remove the duty on denaturized alcohol; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ELKINS presented a petition of Lewis Wetzel Lodge, No. 355, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Parkersburg, W. Va., praying for the enactment of legislation to restrict immigration, and also for the passage of the so-called "anti-injunction bill;" which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented an affidavit to accompany the bill (S. 5428) granting a pension to Lucretia L. Flick; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5560) for the relief of Matthew J. Davis, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. In behalf of the Committee on Immigration, I report back adversely the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 132) permitting the waiving of the alien immigration law in the case of Fannie Diner, which came over from the House of Representatives. I move that the joint resolution be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURKETT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 171) for the relief of the Omaha National Bank, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

JUVENILE COURTS.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed and bound in cloth for the use of the State Department 1,000 copies of the report on "Children's Courts in the United States," House Document 701, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session, with additional pages giving a revised list of the States which have adopted juvenile courts and probation laws.

PUNISHMENT FOR HAZING AT NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 5,000 copies of the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, Fifty-ninth Congress, at the United States Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., on the subject of hazing at the Naval Academy, with accompanying report, 3,500 copies for the House of Representatives and 1,500 for the Senate.

USELESS PAPERS IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. PETTUS. From the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, I submit a report to accompany House Document No. 593, relative to the disposition of useless papers in the Treasury Department, and ask that it be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PENROSE introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 5607) granting an increase of pension to George R. Holt; and

A bill (S. 5608) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Andelfinger.

Mr. PENROSE introduced a bill (S. 5609) for the relief of Annie E. White Shipp and the heirs of Patrick White; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 5610) relative to the conveyance of certain land in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. RAYNER introduced a bill (S. 5611) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Preston; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLARK of Montana introduced a bill (S. 5612) granting a pension to Hannah Geneva Miller; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred ot the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FLINT introduced a bill (S. 5613) for the relief of Solon Bryan; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BURROWS introduced a bill (S. 5614) for the relief of the widow of Harrison S. Weeks; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McENERY introduced a bill (S. 5615) for the relief of Adolph Hartiens; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5617) for the relief of the estate of R. H. Hoffman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BACON introduced a bill (S. 5618) for the relief of the estate of Frances Richardson, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WARNER introduced a bill (S. 5619) for the relief of Mary Christopher, heir of Lowell G. Spaulding, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 5620) granting an increase of pension to Jacob Reichard;

A bill (S. 5621) granting an increase of pension to Frederick Buehrle;

A bill (S. 5622) granting an increase of pension to John Dixon;

A bill (S. 5623) granting an increase of pension to Nicholas M. Hawkins; and

A bill (S. 5624) granting an increase of pension to Rees J. Lewis.

Mr. ELKINS introduced a bill (S. 5625) for the relief of Nancy Shiflett and Malinda Curtis, heirs of Mariah Dodrill, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5626) for the relief of J. B. Johnson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5627) for the relief of Alexander P. Hart, heir of Joseph Hart, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McCREARY introduced a bill (S. 5628) granting a pension to Joel Sparks; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5629) for the relief of Sarah K. T. Baker; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5630) to correct the military record of William Riley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. FLINT submitted an amendment proposing to fix the compensation of the United States district attorney for the southern district of California at $4,500 per annum, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to fix the compensation of the United States marshal for the southern district of California at $4,000 per annum, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $200,000 for the removal of the quarantine station at San Diego, Cal., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment proposing to increase the compensation of the messenger in the office of the Assistant Quartermaster, Marine Corps, Philadelphia, Pa., from $840 to $1,200 per annum, intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ELKINS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $12,500 for indexing public documents, bills, and hearings during the sessions of the Senate, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. MALLORY. I submit a proposed amendment to the rate bill, which I ask may lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be read at the request of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was read and ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

After the word "jurisdiction," at the end of line 9, on page 11, strike out the period and insert a comma in its place and add the following: "and pending any original suit or proceeding, in a court of competent jurisdiction, to modify or suspend said order, by any person whose rights are affected by said order, the rate, regulation, or practice prescribed thereby shall remain in full force and effect, until adjudged unlawful by a final decree or judgment rendered in such suit or proceeding."

THE ISLE OF PINES.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask to have reprinted a paper which I hold in my hand, being "The Isle of Pines (Caribbean Sea), its situation, physical features, inhabitants, resources, and industries," with maps prepared in the Office of Insular Affairs, War Department, and printed at the Government Printing Office.

There being no objection, the order was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the pamphlet entitled "The Isle of Pines (Caribbean Sea), its situation, physical features, inhabitants, resources, and industries," be reprinted.

ABATEMENT OF NUISANCES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. PETTUS. I desire to withdraw the motion I entered yesterday evening for a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill (H. R. 4461) to provide for the abatement of nuisances in the District of Columbia by the Commissioners of said District, and for other purposes, was passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama withdraws the motion entered by him to reconsider the vote by which House bill 4461 was passed, and the bill stands passed.

POST-OFFICE SUPPLIES AND MAIL MATTER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution No. 114, by Mr. CLAY, calling upon the Postmaster-General for certain information regarding the weight of mails, etc.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I offer the following amendment, to come after the word "Departments," in line 10:

Also what were the receipts for the last fiscal year from mail of the second class and the approximate cost to the Government of carrying the same.

I have consulted with the Senator from Georgia, and he agrees to accept the amendment.

Mr. CLAY. I accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

H. R. 10074. An act in relation to contracts with the District of Columbia;

H. R. 14513. An act to prevent the giving of false alarms of fires in the District of Columbia; and

H. R. 17217. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," regulating proceedings for condemnation of land for streets.

H. R. 16954. An act providing for the reappraisement of certain suburban lots in the town sites of Port Angeles, Wash., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

H. R. 17838. An act to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia was read twice by its title.

Mr. GALLINGER. While the bill relates to the District of Columbia, it is a matter dealing with the question of labor, and, as the Committee on the District of Columbia has a great number of bills before it, I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Texas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to give notice that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Texas I shall ask leave to call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 5976) to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, when I first asserted on the floor of the Senate that Congress possesses the power to prevent Federal courts from suspending by preliminary injunction the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, most of those who challenged that assertion attempted to draw a distinction between the power of Congress over proceedings in equity and the power of Congress over proceedings at law, and they contended that there was some peculiar sanctity about the equity power of even an inferior Federal court which removes it beyond legislative limit and control.

It was an easy task to expose the fallacy of that contention, and I could answer all that was urged in its behalf by simply repeating the plain language of the Constitution. Every intelligent layman could readily be brought to understand that, as the judicial power is extended to all cases in "law and equity" in the same clause of the same sentence, and in exactly the same words, the power over the one must, by every rule of sound construction, be exactly the same as the power over the other. I did not for one moment apprehend that many intelligent men could be misled by that shallow and unfounded distinction; but it is nevertheless a great satisfaction to know that it has now been completely and unconditionally abandoned. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] in the course of his speech repudiated it in the most explicit terms when he said:

I agree that, so far as the power of Congress over the inferior courts of the United States is concerned, there is probably no distinction between the courts of equity and the courts of law. I do not see that there is. If the Congress can destroy one, directly or indirectly, I see no reason why it might not destroy the other.

Thus, Mr. President, I am relieved from the necessity of consuming the time of the Senate in discussing this distinction between the power of Congress over proceedings in equity and the power of Congress over proceedings at law, although in the beginning of this controversy that seemed to be the point of main reliance on the part of those who differed with me.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] has also conceded, and in that concession the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] has joined him, that I am right, and that I am sustained by an unbroken line of decisions rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States in declaring that all inferior Federal courts derive their jurisdiction from the laws of Congress and not from the Constitution. Both of those distinguished Senators, however, insist that there is a vital distinction between the judicial power of the Government and the jurisdiction of its courts, and upon that distinction they predicate their entire argument.

In order that the Senate may know that I have not misunderstood and that I have not misstated the position of those Senators, I will read the very words in which they tender the issue between us. The Senator from Wisconsin states it thus:

My proposition is: That when the Congress confers jurisdiction upon the inferior courts of the United States over any one of the cases or controversies enumerated by the Constitution the judicial power ex necessitate rei goes with it, including the instrumentalities which inhere in the jurisdiction and are necessary to its efficient exercise.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], approving the distinction made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], restates it in a no less definite form, as follows:

I am constrained, however, to say that, in arriving at a correct solution of this question, it is necessary to have constantly in mind the distinction between the judicial power of the United States and the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, as prescribed by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Mr. President, I do not belong to that class of men who think they can answer every distinction made by their opponents in debate by inveighing against the advocate's habit of drawing distinctions. In fact, sir, I rather delight in the mental exercise of satisfying my own mind, and of trying to satisfy the minds of those who hear me, that things which are similar are not necessarily identical, and, in my opinion, no mental quality is more valuable than that which enables us to perceive and to point out just and proper distinctions.

But, sir, I must confess that the lawyers' subterfuge of continually striving to—

Distinguish and divide
A hair 'twixt south and southwest side.

has gone far toward justifying the complaint so often uttered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and others like him against what they are pleased to call the endless and confusing wrangles of the lawyers. I recognize the right of those who ought to be guided by our knowledge of the law to complain when we bewilder them with useless refinements instead of leading them into "the gladsome light of jurisprudence."

If, however, the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Pennsylvania have succeeded in establishing a distinction between the judicial power of the Government and the jurisdiction of its courts as those terms are involved in this debate, they have rendered the Senate and they have rendered the country a valuable service, and I hasten to acknowledge that they are entitled to the credit of having been the first to understand and to apply that distinction to a matter of this kind.

But, sir, if I can demonstrate, as I believe I can, that the distinction which they have invented has no relation to the question which we now have under consideration, their best friends must realize that they have made a grave mistake in creating a doubt as to the constitutional power of Congress to do that which all men admit in justice and in reason ought to be done.

JUDICIAL POWER AND JURISDICTION.

At certain times and under certain circumstances it is entirely proper to speak of judicial power rather than of jurisdiction. When the fathers came to establish this Government and to divide it into legislative, executive, and judicial departments, they aptly selected the term "judicial power" to describe the capacity of the new Government to hear and determine all of the cases and controversies subject to its decision. It is also true that ordinarily and correctly we use the term jurisdiction to describe the power which Congress has authorized the courts of its creation to exercise. In this sense, but only in this sense, there is a distinction between judicial power and jurisdiction.

What is judicial power? It has been so often defined by text writers and by the courts that it is our own fault if we permit ourselves to be confused about its meaning. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] read to the Senate one of the clearest and most accurate definitions of judicial power that can be found in the books, but, instead of relying on it, I shall accept the definition proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin. The definition which he gives is taken from the work of Judge Miller on the Constitution, and I do not think it subject to any fair objection.

Certainly the Senator from Wisconsin can not object because the passage which I intend to use is precisely the one which he has used, and I shall use it in exactly the same connection. In fact, sir, the Senator from Wisconsin prefaced his quotation from Judge Miller with the same question which I am now asking. "What," said he, "is the judicial power of the Constitution?" and then he proceeds to answer his own question with the following quotation. Pretermitting that part of it which is unnecessary and coming to the precise point which the Senator sought to emphasize, Judge Miller said:

It—

The judicial power—

is the power of a court to decide and pronounce a judgment and carry it into effect between persons and parties who bring a case before it for decision.

This quotation from Judge Miller is not essentially different from the definition of all other respectable authorities. They all concur in saying that judicial power is the power to hear and decide, the power to pronounce a judgment and to carry that judgment into effect.

What is jurisdiction? "The power to hear and determine a cause is jurisdiction," said the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the United States v. Arredondo. Mr. Bailey, in his excellent work entitled "The Jurisdiction of the Courts," defines it as the power to hear and determine the subject-matter in controversies between parties to a suit, and to adjudicate or exercise any judicial power over them. Bracton defines jurisdiction to be the authority to judge or to declare the law between parties brought into the courts. It was said by Ryan, Chief Justice, in Pierce, 44 Wisconsin, that this definition has never been bettered and probably never would be, and is of universal authority.

Bouvier, in his great work, which is accepted as authoritative by every court in the land, defines jurisdiction—to be the power to hear and determine a cause, the right of a judge to pronounce a sentence of the law on a case or suit brought before him acquired by or through due process of law.

These are almost the same words in which Judge Miller defines judicial power, and there is absolutely no difference between them in principle or in effect. I could multiply these definitions until I had exhausted the patience of the Senate and they would all tend to establish that there is no distinction between the judicial power of the Government and the jurisdiction of its courts when those terms are considered with reference to a proposition like the one now before the Senate.

But, Mr. President, suppose I admit that there is a distinction between the judicial power of the Government and the jurisdiction of its courts even with respect to a question like the one under debate, that distinction, sir, so far from supporting the position of the Senators from Wisconsin and Pennsylvania, must produce upon any unbiased mind precisely the opposite effect. They describe the right of the Government to hear and determine disputes as its judicial power, and they describe the jurisdiction of its courts as the right which Congress has conferred upon those courts to hear and determine certain cases. They confess that the court has no power to act in any given case until Congress has authorized it to do so, but they insist that when Congress has given a court the power to act at all, the Constitution then gives it the power to act beyond the limit of the law and up to the limit of the Constitution.

To state it in another way, they contend that while the court can do nothing without the authority of Congress, yet when Congress gives it authority to do anything, it then has the right to do everything which, under the Constitution, Congress might authorize it to do. It is difficult to believe—although I must believe it, because both Senators have argued that it is true—that intellects like those of the Senators from Wisconsin and Pennsylvania can embrace a doctrine so obviously fallacious. Even under their distinction between the judicial power and jurisdiction, judicial power is the whole power of the Government to hear and determine cases, while jurisdiction is only so much of that power as Congress has conferred upon the courts; and yet these distinguished Senators declare that when Congress confers jurisdiction, which is less than judicial power, it confers by necessary implication judicial power, which is more than jurisdiction. That is an absurdity in logic as well as in law.

I have long been familiar with the rule of construction which holds that when we confer the larger power, we include, by necessary implication, the smaller power; but it was reserved for the Senators from Wisconsin and Pennsylvania to declare the novel and dangerous rule that when we confer the smaller power we include the larger power by necessary implication. If that reasoning, sir, is rorrect, and if it is to become a rule of action in this country, we must not only rewrite our law books but we must revise our school books as well. Our professors must hereafter teach our children, not the old rule, that the whole includes all of its parts, but must teach them this new rule, that every part includes the whole. It will not be easy, Mr. President, to persuade the people of this country to accept such a process of ratiocination, and it finds no sanction anywhere except in the speeches delivered by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Pennsylvania; while an abundant and a conclusive refutation of it can be found in the legislation of Congress and in the decisions of our highest court.

LEGISLATIVE PRECEDENTS.

The judiciary act of 1793 affirmed the power of Congress to do what I am now proposing. That act denied what is now called "the inherent power of the court to issue injunctions," and it prohibited the granting of any injunction without notice to the adverse party or his attorney. That act also prohibited the issuance of any injunction, with or without notice, preliminary or final, to restrain proceedings in State courts; and that, Mr. President, with a slight modification, has been the law of this Republic from its earliest days. It is still the law, and it is found in the Revised Statutes of the United States as section 720. It reads:

SEC. 720. The writ of injunction shall not be granted by any court of the United States to stay proceedings in any court of a State, except in cases where such injunction may be authorized by any law relating to proceedings in bankruptcy.

The Senator from Wisconsin sought to evade the force of that legislative precedent by citing certain decisions, where the Supreme Court of the United States had sustained the right of inferior Federal courts to issue injunctions. I do not charge that the Senator from Wisconsin intended to be uncandid with the Senate, but I do say that the citation of those cases in support of the argument which he was then making, and the language which he employed, was well calculated to mislead all who were not familiar with the facts in those particular cases. After quoting section 720, which I have just read to the Senate, the Senator from Wisconsin declared:

But the Supreme Court of the United States has decided more than once that, notwithstanding this plain prohibition to prevent friction between the courts of the United States and of the States, it possesses power to enjoin proceedings in the State courts not in bankruptcy, where such injunction is essential to the protection and exercise of its jurisdiction and to the giving effect to its decrees.

The Senator from Wisconsin italicized the words "not in bankruptcy," so as to show that the cases to which he referred were not within the exception of the act. To say that, "notwithstanding this plain prohibition," the courts had granted the injunction, might mean that the Supreme Court had held that injunctions could be granted contrary to the provisions of that law, and this would seem to imply a doubt as to the constitutional power of Congress over the subject. As a matter of fact, the Supreme Court neither expressed nor intimated any such opinion. The court did not cast by way of any suggestion the shadow of a doubt upon the power of Congress to enact that law; and it simply held that Congress had not intended to cover such cases as the one at bar.

In order to make it plain that I am not mistaken about this I beg to read from the first of these cases exactly what the court did say; and as the other cases were decided upon the authority of the first, what applies to this of course applies to both of the others. Did the court doubt the power of Congress to pass a law forbidding injunctions to stay proceedings in State courts? Listen:

The prohibition in the judiciary act against the granting of injunctions by the courts of the United States touching proceedings in State courts has no application here. The prior jurisdiction of the court below took the case out of the operation of that provision.

Thus the court by every fair inference and intendment affirmed the power of Congress to forbid the issuance of an injunction, preliminary or final, in cases where, without the statute, it would have been competent for the Federal courts to have enjoined the proceedings.

That is not the only instance in which Congress has asserted this power. We have now, as a part of the Revised Statutes, section 3224, which reads as follows:

SEC. 3224. No suit for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of any tax shall be maintained in any court.

Does anybody doubt that the courts might, upon a bill alleging precisely what they will allege against the Commission rate—that the complainants' property was about to be taken without due process of law—enjoin such action in the absence of that statute? But will any lawyer say that, in the face of that statute, the court can issue an injunction?

The Senator from Wisconsin smiles as though he dissents. It is well for him to smile now, for he will quit smiling before I am through with this argument.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; I know. That does not surprise me, for I have already read it in the newspapers. But what I rose to call the attention of the Senator to was this, that this is a provision in the internal-revenue tax law, and if the Senator will read the concluding section he will find that in the very same act Congress provides an adequate remedy at law.

Mr. BAILEY. And we are going to do the same thing in this act.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, as I do not mean to interrupt him often——

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator is welcome to interrupt me.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will find that to be a proceeding to all intents and purposes against the Government because it is in relation to the collection of a tax, and the power of Congress over it is largely plenary. But when the Government is sued in the matter of taxation, it is obviously true that is a question for the Government to say.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, that argument will not answer, because the very fact that they incorporated this provision in the law shows that they understood that an officer of the Government could be restrained by injunction except for that provision.

It is true that immediately following this provision Congress has provided for a way in which the citizen may recover or escape unjust taxation by applying to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and from him on to the court; and so we have provided for a way to determine what is a just railroad rate by applying to a commission of experts authorized to settle that matter; and all we want to do is to keep the courts off of that commission until the courts have heard all the facts and are ready to decide the case. That is a less extreme exercise of the power to prevent an injunction than that embodied in section 3224.

INJUNCTION AGAINST WORK OF A COMMISSION FORBIDDEN.

But, Mr. President, that is not the only case. I have here a section taken from the act of 1898, and it may surprise some Senators that such a law could have passed the Congress without being understood. What will the Senator say to this? This is a provision in the act of 1898 allowing certain appeals from the United States courts in the Indian Territory directly to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Appeals shall be allowed from the United States courts in the Indian Territory direct to the Supreme Court of the United States to either party, in all citizenship cases, and in all cases between either of the Five Civilized Tribes and the United States involving the constitutionality or validity of any legislation affecting citizenship, or the allotment of lands, in the Indian Territory, under the rules and regulations governing appeals to said court in other cases: Provided, That appeals in cases decided prior to this act must be perfected in one hundred and twenty days from its passage; and in cases decided subsequent thereto, within sixty days from final judgment; but in no such case shall the work of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes be enjoined or suspended by any proceeding in, or order of, any court, or of any judge, until after final judgment in the Supreme Court of the United States.

That act was passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the lawyers in that case did not think to raise this question about the power of Congress to restrain the injunctive process of the courts.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BAILEY. With great pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator from Texas contend that any part of the judicial power of the United States was vested in the courts of the Indian Territory?

Mr. BAILEY. I do not; but that act does not limit the power of the courts in the Indian Territory alone; it limits every court to which a limitation by Congress can apply. It says "by any proceeding in, or order of, any court or any judge until after final judgment in the Supreme Court of the United States."

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. KNOX. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. Did not the Supreme Court of the United States, in upholding the constitutionality of that law, this being the Dawes Commission act, as I understand——

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. KNOX. Decide in Stevens v. Cherokee Nation that the reason why that proceeding was permissible, or the qualifications upon the proceeding was permissible, was because it was not dealing with any vested rights belonging to anyone else, but was dealing with a matter over which Congress had the supreme and dominant control, and therefore it was within the power of Congress to make any regulation affecting this remedy of appeal that it saw fit.

Mr. BAILEY. The statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania does not meet my contention. The court held that the various acts of Congress committing certain matters to the decision of the Dawes Commission in the first instance, and afterwards to the courts of the United States for the Indian Territory, was constitutional, because they were dealing with a matter over which Congress had plenary power. But that does not go to the question as to the power of Congress to forbid the obstruction of its laws by the injunctive processes of its courts, as was done in the section to which I have just called the attention of the Senate.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. KNOX. I think, however, that the Senator will find that what I have stated in relation to the decision of the court is correct; that it was based upon the ground that no vested rights were being interfered with by the act of Congress. I am perfectly familiar with the case and perfectly familiar with the statute which was construed by the case, and I discarded it as worthless because I have always been of the opinion that the territorial courts could not exercise any part of the judicial power of the United States; that it is not competent for Congress to vest any part of the judicial power of the United States in the territorial courts, and therefore Congress may do as it pleases with its processes and with its practice and with its jurisdiction.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not intend to be drawn away from the point I have under discussion by that suggestion because it only goes to the question as to the power of Congress to pass the antecedent laws. The Supreme Court held in the Stevens v. Cherokee Nation case that this act only authorized it to consider the constitutionality of the prior laws. The Supreme Court, in passing upon the constitutionality of those prior laws, upheld them upon the ground indicated by the Senator from Pennsylvania, but in this very act that authorizes it to determine the constitutionality of former acts, Congress inserted this limitation upon the injunctive processes of the courts.

It does not say that the courts in the Indian Territory shall not have the power, but it says—

In no such case shall the work of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes be enjoined or suspended by any proceeding or order of any court.

That is as broad as the universe, or certainly as broad as Congress can make it. I repeat that the lawyers, although assailing the constitutionality of the whole scheme of legislation, did not think it worth their while to say that this act was unconstitutional because it limited the power of the courts to issue an injunction. An injunction against what? Not against a State proceeding, but an injunction against a Federal commission—the Dawes Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes.

THE ANTI-INJUNCTION BILL.

But, Mr. President, while we have no instance in which the Congress has more directly asserted the power than this, we have a more recent instance as to the opinion of the Senate. I have here a bill reported to the Senate by Senator Hoar on May 23, 1902, and substantially the same bill passed the House of Representatives by a practically unanimous vote. This bill was reported to the Senate without a protest from any member of the Judiciary Committee. Beginning in the seventh line of the bill as it passed the House and the sixth line as it was reported to the Senate, we find this language:

Nor shall any restraining order or injunction be issued with relation thereto.

That bill came to the Senate with the unanimous approval of the Judiciary Committee of this body, at the head of which then stood the Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Hoar, and next to him on the Republican side stood the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. Platt. The Democratic membership of the Senate was represented on that committee by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS], the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER], the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. Justice to the memory of Senator Platt of Connecticut requires me to say that he did not join in that report.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator is mistaken about the bill. He doubtless refers to what was known as the Hill bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not mistaken about the bill. I remember perfectly well this bill and its history, and the Senator from Connecticut, although he may not have made a minority report, did not join in the favorable report on that bill. He was distinctly opposed to it at all times and everywhere.

Mr. BAILEY. I do the memory of the late Senator from Connecticut greater honor than does his friend and neighbor, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. Knowing him as I did, I am confident that, if he had believed that bill contrary to the Constitution, he would have filed a minority report, if only in a word. The Senator from Connecticut was opposed to what was known as the old anti-injunction bill or the bill providing for a trial by jury in certain cases of contempt.

WRIT OF HABEAS CORPUS LIMITED.

Mr. President, the right to issue the writ of habeas corpus has been limited. Congress has not only asserted its power to deny to the courts the right to issue injunctions, both preliminary and final, but Congress has asserted its power to abridge the right of the courts to issue even the great writ of liberty. The provision relating to the writ of habeas corpus is contained in the first judiciary act. It provides:

That all the before-mentioned courts of the United States shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions and agreeable to the principles and usages of law. And that either of the justices of the Supreme Court, as well as judges of the district courts, shall have power to grant writs of habeas corpus for the purpose of an inquiry into the cause of commitments: Provided, That writs of habeas corpus shall in no case extend to prisoners in goal unless where they are in custody under or by color of the authority of the United States, or are committed for trial before some court of the same, or are necessary to be brought into court to testify.

There Congress asserts its power to abridge the right of the court to issue the great writ of liberty, a writ so sacred in the history of our race that the Constitution makers deemed it worth their while to write it in the Constitution that it should never be suspended "unless when in case of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it." Yet in the face of that provision the first Congress that assembled under the Constitution, a Congress composed in part of the very men who had written that guaranty against its suspension into the charter of our liberties—provided that it should not be issued except in certain cases. That remained the law for nearly eighty years, and until the act of the 5th of February, in 1867, when Congress extended, as it might have done in the beginning, the privilege of that great writ to men held under any jurisdiction contrary to the Constitution, the laws, or the treaties of the United States.

The Senator from Wisconsin does not forget one of the most famous cases in the annals of our judicial history, which arose out of the act of February 5, 1867. William H. McArdle was the editor of a Mississippi newspaper, and a man with the courage of his convictions. He had denounced in unmeasured terms the misdeeds of the reconstruction government there, for which he was arrested by a military tribunal and charged with an offense against the reconstruction acts of Congress. He sued out a writ of habeas corpus before the circuit judge. The circuit judge decided against him and remanded him to the custody of the military authorities. From that judgment of the circuit court he appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, where he was met with a motion to dismiss the appeal. Upon elaborate argument the Supreme Court of the United States denied the motion to dismiss the appeal, and the case was then argued upon its merits. Between the argument and the decision it became apparent that the Supreme Court would discharge McArdle from the custody of the military authorities; and in that state of the case, when the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court had attached on appeal, when the case had been argued twice, first upon a motion to dismiss the appeal and again upon its merits, Congress passed an act repealing the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court given by the act of February 5, 1867. The President of the United States vetoed the repealing act of Congress, but Congress passed it over the President's veto, and the Supreme Court of the United States was compelled to dismiss the McArdle appeal for want of jurisdiction.

The Senator from Wisconsin in a colloquy with the Senator from Maryland said this is the chaos of anarchy for which we are contending. If he wants an example of anarchy he will find it in the McArdle case. Argued, and practically decided, Congress prevented the judgment of the court from being put into a legal form by repealing the authority under which the court had heard the case.

WRIT OF MANDAMUS LIMITED.

Mr. President, not only has Congress asserted its right to limit the power of the court in issuing this great writ of liberty, but it has also asserted its right, in the section which I have read, to control the courts in the issuance of all other writs known to the common law. The Senator will find there that Congress authorized the courts to issue writs of mandamus in certain cases, and then he will find the decisions of the courts in which they hold that they could issue writs of mandamus in no other cases. What is the writ of mandamus? The Senator from Wisconsin has told the Senate what it is, and I want to use not only the quotation which he makes from the court, but his own words as well. The Senator says:

The writ of mandamus at the common law was a high prerogative writ.

And so it was.

It has become in later years—

Said he, and then he follows with a quotation from the books—

more and more assimilated to an ordinary remedy to the use of which the parties are entitled as of right. It was in this sense that Taney, Chief Justice, characterized it in modern practice as nothing more than an action at law between the parties. It is still an extraordinary remedy at law in the same sense that injunction is in equity.

The Senator says there is no difference between the power of Congress over courts of law and courts of equity. The Senator says the writ of mandamus is to the law what the writ of injunction is to equity. I point him to the law of Congress restraining the issuance of the writ of mandamus according to its wisdom, and I shall later point him to the decisions of the court in which so great a judge as Marshall himself has said that the writ of mandamus could only issue in accordance with the statutory provision of Congress.

RIGHT TO PUNISH CONTEMPT LIMITED.

Mr. President, Congress has exercised its power over a still more essential function of the court; I do not say inherent, because there are no inherent powers in Federal courts. The duty of the Federal courts is not to make the law, but to obey it as Congress has made it. I will not occupy my time in discussing that question, because the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] in his speech on yesterday left nothing further to say upon it.

Congress has exercised the right to abridge the power of all Federal courts to punish for contempt. If there is one power more fundamental and more essential to a court than all others, it is the power to punish for contempt. Judge Field said in the case of Ex parte Robinson that it is inherent; that the very creation of the court conferred upon it the power to punish for contempt; and yet Judge Field sustained in that very case the right of Congress to abridge that power.

The Senator from Wisconsin and no other Senator will assail the act of 1831. The Senator from Wisconsin and no other Senator will impeach the wisdom or the justice of that act. It grew out of an abuse of its power by an inferior court, an abuse that so far as the debates show was confined almost exclusively to Judge Peck, of Missouri. He exercised in an arbitrary and outrageous manner the summary power to punish an attorney of his court for contempt, for which he was impeached. He was not convicted, but his misbehavior left such an impression upon the fair-minded and liberty-loving men in both House of Congress that the act of 1831 was the result of his misconduct.

If Congress, when one judge abuses his power to punish for contempt, can limit and restrict that power, in God's name can it be said that Congress has no power to restrict the right of injunction when it has been abused by so many Federal judges?

The Senator from Pennsylvania is of course familiar with the decision which he will permit me to call to his attention. It is a decision rendered at the Pennsylvania circuit by Judge Baldwin, under the act of 1831, and here is what the learned Justice said about the power of Congress in that respect:

As this is an inferior court, within the provisions of the Constitution, it is created by the laws with such powers—

Not jurisdiction, but—with such powers only as Congress has deemed it proper to confer, among which is this, "and to punish by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of said courts, all contempts of authority in any cause or hearing before the same." (I. Laws U. S. 63, act of 1789.)

The act of 1831 must be taken to be the declared construction of this and all other laws, limiting its operation in the manner prescribed and as generally considered. Congress is to this court what the Constitution is to the Supreme Court, their acts must be construed on the same principles and operate as constitutional amendments which is to give such construction to the original act, as if the jurisdiction had never been given.

Justice Baldwin held in that case, as Justice Field held in the later case, that the act of 1831, limiting and defining contempts of court, and abridging the right of the court to punish in many cases, was a valid and constitutional exercise of power.

The Senator from Wisconsin, after referring to the Robinson case decided by Judge Field, then calls the attention of the Senate to the Debs case, and says the court declared in that case that the power to punish summarily is inherent. The court did say that, just as the court had said the same in the Robinson case, and still the court sustained the act of 1831.

When the decision in the Debs case was made, the country believed that the judges were exercising—I will not say usurping, but I will say that the judges were exercising—a dangerous and an arbitrary power which might be abused to the injury of the citizens' liberty, and immediately following that decision bills were introduced in both Houses of Congress to protect the public against the exercise of such a power in the hands of a single man.

The bill in the Senate was introduced and managed by Senator Hill of New York. That bill passed this body without a division, and but one man lifted his voice in opposition to it. That was the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. Platt, and yet time and again he declared that he was not opposed to the principle of the bill, but protested that it was being pressed for passage in the closing hours of the session, when only a bare quorum of Senators were in the city. He moved to postpone it to the next session, and his motion was voted down by a vote of 30 to 1. Then followed a call of the Senate, in order to establish the presence of a quorum, and when a quorum appeared that bill was passed through this body without a division.

As it was first reported from the Judiciary Committee it divided all cases of contempt into direct and indirect. It allowed the court to punish summarily the direct contempts, but it provided that indirect contempts should be tried by a jury upon the application of the offender and in the discretion of the court. In the open Senate they struck out, without division, that part of the bill which left it to the discretion of the court whether the offender should be tried by a jury, and passed the bill with the right of trial by jury made absolute upon the demand of the accused. Thus, Mr. President, the Senate, by a practically unanimous vote, and without a minority report from the committee, passed, without a division in the Senate, a bill depriving the Federal courts of the power to punish for certain contempts and committing that great and, as Judge Field calls it, inherent power to the juries of the country.

Mr. President, a melancholy reflection follows the reading of this debate. It reminds us of the certainty of death and the uncertainty of politics. Of the Senators who participated in that discussion, all have passed from among us save one. The great Senator who opposed it has been gathered to his fathers. The great Senator who championed it, in the shifting fortunes of parties, has retired from the public service. One after another they have gone—some have returned to private life, while some have followed each other to "where beyond these voices there is peace." The only one left who participated in that debate is the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], and on that occasion I rejoice to say he was contending for the right of Congress to limit the power of the courts.

But, Mr. President, if the legislative history of the country affords an abundant justification for the amendment which I have offered, the decisions of the courts are still more conclusive. Before I proceed to examine the decisions upon that question, however, I desire to review the cases which have been cited by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Pennsylvania. The Senator from Wisconsin cites as the first case upon which he relies an extract from Judge Story's opinion in the famous case of Martin v. Hunter's Lessee.

JUDGE STORY'S ESSAY.

I need not tell the Senator from Wisconsin, and I need not tell other Senators, that the extract which he quotes was foreign to the question decided in that case. The point at issue there was not the power of the court to act independently of or contrary to what Congress had provided, because Congress had incorporated into the first judiciary act the very power which the court then sought to exercise.

That case is familiar history. It is one of the celebrated causes. An appeal came from an inferior Virginia court, through the supreme court of that State, to the Supreme Court of the United States. The Supreme Court of the United States reversed the decision of the supreme court of Virginia; but the supreme court of Virginia declined to execute the mandate of the Supreme Court of the United States, and in its order declining stated that the appellate jurisdiction conferred by the judiciary act upon the Supreme Court over judgments of the highest courts of the States was in derogation of the Constitution. The point at issue in that case was not whether Congress must give all the power which it could give to the Federal courts, but whether Congress could give the power which it had given.

In that state of the case, Judge Story delivered the opinion which contains the famous essay which the Senator from Wisconsin read. An essay is all it is. It had no relation to the question to be decided in that case. But the distinguished jurist indulged himself in a habit which was all too frequent with him of incorporating his political tenets into his judicial opinions.

The Senator from Wisconsin says that although there was a dissenting opinion in that case, there was no dissent from the point which Judge Story announced in the portion of the opinion which he quoted. The Senator from Wisconsin is a great lawyer; he is an accurate student; but even great Homer sometimes nods, and the Senator from Wisconsin erred most grievously in that statement. There was a dissent in that case from the very doctrine which he quotes from the opinion of Judge Story.

Perhaps the Senator from Wisconsin, being so familiar with the doctrine, did not think it worth his while to closely read the opinion again before invoking it, for otherwise it could not have escaped him that Justice Johnson did dispute the very proposition of Judge Story which the Senator from Wisconsin quotes as authority for his position. And what makes the Senator's oversight more remarkable still is that when Judge Story came to write his book on the Constitution, he undertook to answer the very criticism which Justice Johnson had made in the dissenting opinion which he delivered in the case of Martin v. Hunter's Lessee.

The Senator from Wisconsin also quotes from the opinion of Justice Baldwin in Ex parte Crane to sustain his view that Congress can not choose but confer upon Federal courts all the powers which the Constitution permits it to confer. The Senator from Wisconsin said:

It is said by Mr. Justice Baldwin in Ex parte Crane—

"Though the courts of the United States are capable of exercising the whole judicial power as conferred by the Constitution, and though Congress are bound to provide by law for its exercise in all cases to which that judicial power extends, yet it has not been done, and much of it remains dormant for the want of legislation to enable the courts to exercise it, it having been repeatedly and uniformly decided by this court that legislative provisions are indispensable to give effect to a power to bring into action the constitutional jurisdiction of the Supreme and inferior courts."

Here, Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin fell into another serious lapse for which I am justified in criticising him. When he cited that opinion he cited it in a way to lead any lawyer in the world to suppose that he was reading from the opinion of the court, and yet that extract is from a dissenting opinion. Chief-Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court in that case, and this quotation of the Senator is from a dissenting opinion. But waiving all question about that mistake, which I am sure was unintentional, I can not comprehend what comfort the Senator from Wisconsin can find in the extract from this dissenting opinion which he has read. It is true that Justice Baldwin does say that "Congress is bound to provide by law for its exercise in all cases to which that judicial power extends." The Senator prints that statement in italics, strangely overlooking the fact that in the same sentence Justice Baldwin says this has not been done and adds that "much of it remains dormant for want of legislation to enable the courts to exercise it." This is exactly what I am contending. I maintain that all of the judicial power of the Government remains dormant so far as the inferior courts are concerned until legislation enables them to exercise it.

I shall have occasion to refer to this extract again when I come to show that the courts have always ignored this new and fine distinction between judicial power and jurisdiction, but for the present I pass to the paragraph in that opinion which immediately follows the one quoted by the Senator from Wisconsin, and in which Justice Baldwin frankly declares that the opinion which he expresses about the duty of Congress is not the opinion of the court. Here it is:

> These principles remain unquestioned. They have long been settled, as the judicial exposition of the Constitution, on solemn argument and the gravest consideration; and they are binding on all courts and judges. I shall ever be found among the last to oppose my opinion in opposition to the results of the deliberate judgment of the highest tribunal when thus formed.

The Senator from Wisconsin gave the Senate the benefit of Judge Baldwin's opinion upon the political duty of Congress to invest the court with the whole judicial power of the Government, but he neglected to give the Senate the benefit of Judge Baldwin's admission that the court had not held the same view of the question which he expressed. I do not intend in saying this to insinuate that the Senator from Wisconsin designed to mislead the Senate. My opinion is that he did not himself read the entire opinion carefully.

Another case which the Senator from Wisconsin relies on is the Wheeling Bridge case, in 13th Howard. The Senator quotes a part of the opinion and then he indicates very properly by stars the omission of a part. I want to supply that omission. I want to rub out those stars and write in their place the words of the court.

The Senator read down to "observed," which is the close of a paragraph, and then he omits this:

> In Robinson v. Campbell (3 Wheat., 222), it is said: "The court, therefore, think that, to effectuate the purposes of the legislature, the remedies in the courts of the United States are to be at common law or in equity, not according to the practice of State courts, but according to the principles of common law and equity, as distinguished and defined in that country from which we derive our knowledge of those principles."

Mark the admission "that to effectuate the purpose of the legislature" those principles were adopted.

The Senator from Wisconsin omits other matter which could properly be omitted, and concludes his quotation from this opinion in these words:

> Under this system, where relief can be given by the English chancery, similar relief may be given by the courts of the Union.

Above that and next to it is this sentence:

> By the act of Congress of 1828, proceedings at law, in the courts of the United States, are required to conform to the modes of proceeding in the State courts; but there is no such provision in regard to courts of chancery.

Under the act of Congress the law proceedings must conform to the proceedings of State courts, but as no such provision was made in respect to equity, they follow the proceedings of the chancery court of England. The Senator admits that there is no difference between the power of Congress over law and equity. Therefore when the court in this very opinion says that Congress, in the exercise of its power, had conformed the proceedings in courts of law to the proceedings in the several States, it asserts that Congress might have done the same as to proceedings in equity, and it was only because it had failed to include courts of equity in the statute that they were left to administer their justice according to the chancery system of Great Britain.

A DANGEROUS DOCTRINE.

The Senator from Wisconsin, in his eagerness to exalt the courts above the Congress, has announced the most dangerous doctrine ever heard within the four walls of this Senate. He has approved the old obiter dictum in the case of Calder v. Bull, where Judge Chase declared that the courts are not limited by constitutions in supervising the action of legislatures, and that they may hold a law void, not because it violates a Constitution, but because it contravenes the court's idea of natural right and justice.

I will ask the Secretary to read this passage from the Senator's speech at length, because I regard it as the most perilous preachment which has been delivered from a seat in the Senate for well-nigh a century.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

> Now, Mr. President, that brings me to the Senator's question. There are restrictions in the Constitution upon the exercise by Congress in this particular class of cases, I think, upon the power to restrain courts of equity from issuing interlocutory injunctions. After the adoption of the Constitution, amendments to it were adopted which restrict in many ways the power of Congress as it was conferred by the Constitution itself. Among others is the fifth amendment, which is as follows:
> "No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself; nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."
> Without that amendment, Mr. President, I should doubt if private property could be taken for public use without just compensation. I do not think it required a constitutional provision to prevent the Congress from enacting a law taking the property of one man and vesting it in another, because that would be violative of fundamental principles which underlie government and which are an essential and vital part of the social compact as we know it.
> In a decision of the Supreme Court long ago, the opinion being delivered by Mr. Justice Chase, and being one of great learning, it is declared that, without constitutional restriction, there are acts so abhorrent to natural equity and to every sane man's sense of justice that, although not prohibited by written constitutions, they can not be lawfully done. (See Calder v. Bull, 3 Dallas, 387.)

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the opinion to which the Senator refers was delivered upon a controversy that did not involve the disquisition on natural rights which Judge Chase wove into that opinion. Judge Chase himself in beginning this very dissertation admits that the case before the court did not present that question. He introduced the very part of the opinion to which the Senator refers with this statement:

> Whether the legislature of any of the States can revise and correct by law a decision of any of its courts of justice, although not prohibited by the constitution of the State, is a question of very great importance, and not necessary now to be determined; because the resolution or law in question does not go so far.

But he follows that admission that the question was not in the case with an elaborate discussion of the duty of the court in protecting the natural rights of man. There were three opinions read in that case, the one by Judge Chase, another by Judge Patterson, and a third by Justice Iredell, who in my humble opinion has been surpassed in learning, in wisdom, and in patriotism by very few who have served in that exalted station. There can be no comparison between Chase and Iredell. It will be recalled that Chase had so little regard for the rights of men that he was called to the bar of the Senate to answer impeachment charges for the oppressive and arbitrary manner in which he insulted and abused the attorneys of his court.

Justice Iredell, replying to this very argument of Judge Chase, denied it in the most explicit terms and held the true doctrine that the legislative body has the power to do anything not forbidden, in the case of the State, by the constitution and anything permitted, in the case of the General Government, by the Constitution.

I shall not read the passage from the opinion of Justice Iredell in which he combats the argument of Judge Chase because the Senator from Wisconsin did not read the deliverance of Judge Chase. The fact, however, that the Senator from Wisconsin has given the sanction of his name to this dangerous heresy calls for more than a mere reference to it.

The most elaborate consideration that has been given to that subject by any court or by any text writer within my knowledge will be found in Sedgwick's very excellent work on the Constitution and Statutory Construction. For more than 20 pages he examines the question. He reviews the early English cases, in which it was held that the courts might hold a law of Parliament void because they thought it contrary to natural justice. He also reviews the earlier State cases in this country, and this is his conclusion:

> That it is the right and duty of the judiciary to repress and confine the legislative body within the true limits of the law-making power; but that they have no right whatever to set aside, to arrest, or nullify a law passed in relation to a subject within the scope of the legislative authority on the ground that it conflicts with their notions of natural right, abstract justice, or sound morality.

Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, expresses the same conclusion:

> We have elsewhere expressed the opinion that a statute can not be declared void on the ground solely that it is repugnant to a supposed general intent or spirit which it is thought pervades or lies concealed in the Constitution, but wholly unexpressed, or because, in the opinion of the court, it violates fundamental rights or principles, if it was passed in the exercise of a power which the Constitution confers. Still less will the injustice of a constitutional provision authorize the courts to disregard it, or indirectly to annul it by construing it away. It is quite possible that the people may, under the influence of temporary prejudice, or a mistaken view of public policy, incorporate provisions in their charter of government infringing upon the proper rights of individual citizens or upon principles which ought ever to be regarded as sacred and fundamental in republican government; and it is also possible that obnoxious classes may be unjustly disfranchised. The remedy for such injustice must be found in the action of the people themselves, through an amendment of their work when better counsels prevail. Such provisions, when free from doubt, must receive the same construction as any other.

Lewis, in his work on Eminent Domain, lays down the same doctrine. Referring to the early cases in which it had been held that the States or the General Government would have no power to apply private property to public use without making just compensation, he lays down the doctrine thus:

The idea, however, that the legislature of a State is restrained by limitations which are not to be found in the written Constitution is not founded upon any sound legal or philosophical principles. The later authorities and the better reasoning are against such a view.

Just exactly why the Senator from Wisconsin desired to revive that old conflict of opinion I am not able to see. Is there a settled determination in this country to give to the courts a power which the Constitution intended to lodge with Congress? Is there a deliberate purpose not only to permit but to invite the courts of this country to assume to themselves the right to determine what are the principles of natural right and justice against solemn legislative enactments? I impute no such motive to the Senator from Wisconsin, and yet I must be permitted to say that the time was never so unfortunate as now for the revival and indorsement of such a doctrine. For thirty years the people of this country have been accustomed to seeing the courts exercise arbitrary and extraordinary power; and a new generation of lawyers has come to the bar, who think it treason and who call it anarchy to restrain those powers.

Mr. President, I have no hesitation in saying that if this Government was organized upon a principle which allows one man to abuse or misuse his power and yet denies Congress the right to restrain him, it was founded upon a false principle. I yield to no man in my respect for the courts. To me the judge is a nobler character than the soldier. To me the patient man who, with a clear mind, a brave heart, and clean hands, holds the scales of justice in even balance, is a mightier force for progress and civilization than any warrior who ever rode to victory or death. The judge, patiently deciding the law as the lawmaking power has made it, is to me an inspiration and an example. But if we are to invest the courts with the power not to declare the law as we have made it, but to declare it in opposition to our will, and as it reposes in their own hearts and minds, then, sir, they must in the end reduce all departments of this Government to an absolute dependence on their power.

This is the first Government in the history of the world which ever organized a judiciary department and gave it the power to annul everything that the other departments might do. God knows, that is power enough for any small body of men to exercise. To vest them with the right to judge whether we have kept our oaths to obey the Constitution when we made the law is power enough to give to even that great tribunal without inviting it to look beyond the Constitution and assume our duty to defend and guard the natural rights of men. We are ninety, chosen by the very elect of all the people. They are nine, who receive their appointment from a single man, ratified and confirmed by us. I would not trench upon their power; but I would hold myself unworthy of my station here if I should yield to them a power which the Constitution has confided to Congress.

RIGHT OF EMINENT DOMAIN.

As if to make a specific application to this very case of his doctrine that the court is above both the Constitution and the laws, the Senator from Wisconsin affirms that this Government could not take private property and apply it to a public use without making a just compensation to the owner, even without the fifth amendment to the Constitution. Fortunately I am not left to answer this announcement of the law with such poor arguments as I can deduce from the nature of our Government. Upon this difference of opinion I appeal again to the highest court in all the land and I rest the issue upon their decision. That very question came before the Supreme Court in the case of Boom Company v. Patterson, reported in 98 U. S. Justice Field, who delivered the opinion, speaking to this very point, laid down the law as follows:

The position of the company on this head of jurisdiction is this: That the proceeding to take private property for public use is an exercise by the State of its sovereign right of eminent domain, and with its exercise the United States, a separate sovereignty, has no right to interfere by any of its departments. This position is undoubtedly a sound one, so far as the act of appropriating the property is concerned. The right of eminent domain—that is, the right to take private property for public uses—appertains to every independent government. It requires no constitutional recognition; it is an attribute of sovereignty. The clause found in the constitutions of the several States providing for just compensation for property taken is a mere limitation upon the exercise of the right.

The next was a Wisconsin case, reported in 109 U. S., 513, under the style of U. S. v. Jones, and the opinion could not be more directly in point. That part relating to this particular question is as follows:

The position of the counsel of the United States in the court below, as we understand it, was substantially this: That the power vested in the Federal Government to take private property for the public uses of the United States is, in its nature, exclusive, and its exercise by any State is therefore prohibited as completely as though the prohibition were expressed in terms; that the power can not, therefore, be delegated to the State of Wisconsin; that the ascertainment of the compensation is involved in the exercise of the power as a necessary part of it, in as much as there can be no lawful taking until compensation is made, and that the act of Congress transferring to the State board and State court the function of ascertaining the value of the property taken and the amount of compensation to be made is therefore invalid.

There is, in this position, an assumption that the ascertainment of the amount of compensation to be made is an essential element of the power of appropriation; but such is not the case. The power to take private property for public uses, generally termed the right of eminent domain, belongs to every independent government. It is an incident of sovereignty, and as said in Boom v. Patterson, 98 U. S., 106, requires no constitutional recognition. The provision found in the fifth amendment to the Federal Constitution, and in the constitutions of the several States, for just compensation for the property taken, is merely a limitation upon the use of the power. It is no part of the power itself, but a condition upon which the power may be exercised. It is undoubtedly true that the power of appropriating private property to public uses vested in the General Government—its right of eminent domain, which Battel defines to be the right of disposing in case of necessity and for the public safety of all the wealth of the country—can not be transferred to a State any more than its other sovereign attributes; and that, when the use to which the property taken is applied is public, the propriety or expediency of the appropriation can not be called in question by any other authority. But there is no reason why the compensation to be made may not be ascertained by any appropriate tribunal capable of estimating the value of the property. There is nothing in the nature of the matter to be determined which calls for the establishment of any special tribunal by the appropriating power. (United States v. Jones, administrator, and others. In error to the supreme court of the State of Wisconsin. U. S. Reports 109, pp. 518–519.)

Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] though less elaborate, was not less in error on this question than the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. In all the authorities which he quotes, except the Michigan case, it is simply the expression of a text-book writer upon the law as it exists and not upon the law as it could be made by Congress. The Michigan case itself does not decide this contention in favor of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I call the Senator's attention to that case, and he will find that the syllabus, after announcing the points which are decided by the court, then states that certain propositions deducible from Judge Campbell's opinion, thus practically saying that they are merely the dicta of the judge.

If the Senator from Pennsylvania, with his great industry and legal attainments, had looked a little closer home, he could have found a case more in point. In 69 Pennsylvania State Reports the question of the power of the legislature to distribute the judicial power of the Pennsylvania constitution arose. It seemed to be so obvious that a district attorney refused to execute the law. The matter finally reached the supreme court of that State, and I direct the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania to this declaration in the opinion:

The constitution having neither defined nor limited the jurisdictions of the courts named in the constitution—

My recollection is that the constitution of Pennsylvania not only provided by name for a supreme court, but provided by name for certain inferior courts as well, and therefore the case is all the stronger:

The Constitution having neither defined nor limited the jurisdictions of the courts named in the Constitution, or of those to be afterwards established, the power to create new courts and new law judges carried with it the power to invest them with such jurisdictions as appear to be necessary and proper.

Now, let us see how the Pennsylvania judge distinguishes between jurisdiction and judicial power. He has used the word "jurisdiction" in the line which I have just read, and then goes on:

And to part and divide the judicial powers of the State so as to adapt them to its growth and change of circumstances—is within the power of the legislature. Not to give jurisdiction, and let jurisdiction give judicial power; but the Pennsylvania court says it is competent for the legislature to part and divide the judicial power of that State; and its constitution in that respect was stronger than our own, because it named, in addition to the supreme court, certain inferior courts which were to be established.

The Senator from Pennsylvania quotes from certain text-book writers as to what the law of equity jurisprudence is, but he seemed to forget that those text-book writers in every case but one were discussing the law as it is; and the law is as it is because Congress has made it so. If the Senator will consult the case of Robinson against Campbell, in 3 Wheaton, he will find that very question discussed. I believe I will take a moment to show the Senator why it is that text-book writers lay down the law as they do. In almost a page of the opinion in Robinson against Campbell the court discusses the equity law of the United States:

It is material to consider whether it was the intention of Congress by these provisions to confine the courts of the United States in their mode of administering relief to the same remedies, and those only, with all their incidents, which existed in the courts of the respective States. In other words, whether it was their intention—

Whose intention? Not of the Constitution, but of the Congress—

In other words, whether it was their intention to give the party relief at law, where the practice of the State courts would give it, and relief in equity only when, according to such practice, a plain, adequate, and complete remedy could not be had at law. In some States in the Union no court of chancery exists to administer equitable relief. In some of those States courts of law recognize and enforce, in suits at law, all the equitable claims and rights which a court of equity would recognize and enforce; in others all relief is denied, and such equitable claims and rights are to be considered as mere nullities at law. A construction, therefore, that would adopt the State practice in all its extent, would at once extinguish, in such States, the exercise of equitable jurisdiction. The acts of Congress have distinguished between remedies at common law and in equity, yet this construction would confound them. The court, therefore, think that to effectuate the purposes of the legislature the remedies in the courts of the United States are to be at common law or in equity, not according to the practice of State courts, but according to the principles of common law and equity, as distinguished and defined in that country from which we derive our knowledge of those principles.

That case involved the question whether they should administer equitable relief in the State according to the State practice, and as some of the States had no equitable relief then it became a vastly important one. Through all of that decision the object of the court was, to ascertain the intention of the Congress. Their final conclusion was that they would best conform to that intention by a certain construction of the law, and they followed that. Now, if Congress had no power to make it otherwise, it would have been a waste of time to argue that the law should be construed one way or the other. If the judicial power is what the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Wisconsin assert it to be, then the Congress has no power to prescribe the law for courts of equity, and therefore it was a waste for the court to consider that question.

But, Mr. President, happily the Senator from Pennsylvania, with that felicity which characterizes the really great lawyer, finally reduces the whole question to a single sentence. Here is where he makes the crucial test, and I accept it as decisive in this debate. He says:

Congress can clearly say when the judicial power operating through the circuit courts shall speak, but not how it shall speak.

That is exactly my own opinion, and I could not have stated it more concisely. I am willing to leave with the court the right to say how it shall decide these cases; and I only ask Congress to say when it shall decide them. I do not say—and it would be a nullity if Congress were to so say in any statute—that the courts shall decide these cases for the Commission or for the railroads. I ask Congress to exercise no power like that because I know that to be a judicial power. I only ask Congress to say that the courts shall not decide these cases at all until it is ready to decide them right, and, according to the Senator from Pennsylvania, that is a legislative power. I am willing to write it in the law that Congress disclaims the power to say how the court shall decide any case, provided that it also be written that the court shall not decide a case under this law at all until it is ready to decide it right. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania agree to that? If so, probably we can find a way out of this perplexing situation.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. Does the Senator from Texas desire me to answer now or at some future time? It would probably impinge too much on the Senator's time if he should pause for me to answer at present.

Mr. BAILEY. Perhaps, Mr. President, I transgress the proprieties of debate when I invite the Senator by name to answer me.

Mr. KNOX. Then I consider the invitation withdrawn.

Mr. BAILEY. I would of course yield to the Senator for that purpose or for any other purpose.

The Senator from Pennsylvania attaches so much importance to the difference between "when" and "how" that he italicizes both words. I agree with him that it is not competent for Congress to say how the court shall decide the case. I only ask him to agree with his own speech and say that it is competent for Congress to say when the court shall decide it.

The Senator from Pennsylvania proposes another test by which to settle this question, and upon which I am willing to submit it. He says:

A correct solution of the question mooted is to be arrived at only by keeping in mind the fundamental difference between the jurisdiction of a court and the judicial power which operates and extends over the matters of which it has jurisdiction, which power is itself the life of the court. The creator and life giver of the whole judicial system is the Constitution, and not Congress.

I will confess my error in this argument if I can not show by many decisions that "the creator and life giver" of inferior courts is Congress and not the Constitution. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania confess his error if I do show that? I trust he will be governed by a test which he has himself proposed.

Mr. President, leaving the incidental questions which the Senators from Wisconsin and Pennsylvania have raised, I return now to the decisive question between us—to the distinction between judicial power and jurisdiction; and I pledge myself to produce the authority of eminent text writers and numerous decisions from our highest court which will establish beyond all doubt that such a distinction has no basis in our law when considered in reference to this question. But before I proceed with that, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin, the Senator from Pennsylvania, and other Senators seem to have misconceived the authority under which the inferior courts of the United States are established. They seem to think that Congress establishes those courts under the judiciary clause of the Constitution and under the power implied in the declaration that—

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish the power to establish courts.

But, sir, if these Senators will turn to the section of the Constitution which enumerates the powers of Congress, they will find amongst those enumerated powers this:

The Congress shall have power to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court.

And yet the Senators seem to think that though Congress had the power to pass the law constituting these inferior tribunals, it would have no power to repeal it. I declare, without the slightest hesitation, that Congress can repeal every law on the statute book establishing a tribunal inferior to the Supreme Court of the United States, because every such tribunal was established under this power.

The Senator from Wisconsin says it would be anarchy to do so. I hardly think I would characterize it by a term so strong as that, for there would still be left State courts in which men could vindicate their constitutional and legal rights. I remember that almost the first act of Jefferson's Administration was to repeal what was known as the "midnight judge's law." They repealed the act of the Adams's Administration which created seventeen additional United States judges, and turned them adrift without an office and without a district. Whether Congress could deprive those judges of their right to compensation after they had been appointed is another question; but that it could repeal the act creating their offices and defining their districts is absolutely beyond all question.

It will not do to urge that a power does not exist because it might be abused. The Senator from Wisconsin will not deny that Congress has the power to declare war; and if it were to declare war to-day against every nation in the world, however wrongful the exercise of that power would be, the constitutionality of it would be indisputable. If Congress, without sufficient cause, should declare war against every nation on the globe, the people of this land would scourge us from the high places which we had disgraced—would withdraw from us the great trust we had betrayed; and still the reckless act declaring war against all nations would be the law of the land until repealed.

The Congress of the United States can, by its proper vote, repeal every criminal law upon the statute book. To do so would approach dangerously close to anarchy, but no man could successfully contend that the repealing act was beyond the power of Congress. Mr. President, as every inferior court of the United States was created by an act of Congress they can all be destroyed by an act of Congress, and their jurisdiction, or, if you choose to use the other term, their judicial power, can be limited by an act of Congress. The power to create and the power to destroy must, in the nature of things, include the power to limit and control.

But, sir, I need not detain the Senate with an inquiry as to whether or not Congress can destroy these courts. However conclusively I may think that can be established by argument, it has never been before the courts, and I prefer to confine myself to the cases which have been decided.

THE TEXT-BOOKS AGREE.

Before going to the decisions of the courts I want to read from the text writers on this subject. Their opinions are uniform. First, I want to read from Judge Story, whose opinion in the Martin case the Senator from Wisconsin described as illuminating. Judge Story himself thought well of that opinion, and he incorporated an extended extract from it in his work on the Constitution of the United States—wonderful piece of argumentation, to write an opinion and include in it an essay, then write a book and include in it the opinion containing the essay, thus having the essay to support the opinion and the essay to support the book—and yet within three pages of where Judge Story ended his quotation from the old case of Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, he uses these words:

The Constitution has wisely established that there shall be one Supreme Court, with a view to uniformity of decision in all cases whatsoever belonging to the judicial department, whether they arise at the common law or in equity, or within the admiralty and prize jurisdiction, whether they respect the doctrines of mere municipal law, or constitutional law, or the law of nations. It is obvious that if there were independent supreme courts of common law, of equity, and of admiralty, a diversity of judgment might, and almost necessarily would spring up, not only as to the limits of the jurisdiction of each tribunal, but as to the fundamental doctrines of municipal, constitutional, and public law. The effect of this diversity would be that a different rule would or might be promulgated on the most interesting subjects by the several tribunals; and thus citizens be involved in endless doubts, not only as to their private rights, but as to their public duties. The Constitution itself would or might speak a different language, according to the tribunal which is called upon to interpret it; and thus interminable disputes might embarrass the administration of justice throughout the whole country. But the same reason did not apply to the inferior tribunals. Theses were, therefore, left entirely to the discretion of Congress as to their number, their jurisdiction, and their powers.

"It was left," says Judge Story, "entirely to the discretion of Congress as to the number, the jurisdiction, and the power of the inferior courts." What is the power of a court? Judicial power, of course. They tell us that the courts can exercise no other; and I agree to that. Therefore, when Judge Story talks about leaving the powers of the court to the discretion of Congress he means, and could only mean, judicial powers.

Here is Cooley's small but very excellent work on the "Principles of Constitutional Law." What does he say?

But, although the Constitution extends the power—

Not the jurisdiction, mark you—

But, although the Constitution extends the power to cases specified it does not make complete provision for its exercise, except in the few cases of which the Supreme Court is authorized to take cognizance. For other cases it is necessary that courts shall be created by Congress, and their respective jurisdictions defined; and in creating them Congress may confer upon each so much—

Jurisdiction? Oh, no.

So much of the judicial power of the United States as to its wisdom shall seem proper and suitable, and restrict that which is conferred at discretion.

It seems as if he might have foreseen that some mind would be so subtle as to invent the distinction upon which the Senators from Wisconsin and Pennsylvania are now insisting.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator allow me to finish this quotation? It is only 3 lines more.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. Judge Cooley continues:

In doing so it may apportion among the several Federal courts all the judicial power of the United States, or it may apportion a part only, and in that case what is not apportioned will be left to be exercised by the courts of the States.

Now I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I have listened with great interest, and I think with profit, to the fundamental proposition of the Senator from Texas, that as to inferior courts established under the law, Congress must have the same power with reference to their action and with reference, if need be, to their abolition that it had in creating them. My mind runs with the Senator upon that point. I do not accept the doctrine of the inviolability of an inferior court created by Congress under the Constitution as being beyond all control by Congress afterwards; otherwise the provision that Congress shall establish inferior courts must be limited to the one Congress that establishes those courts. I believe that the power to regulate and control their processes, their life even, rests with Congress. In that I agree with the Senator.

I rose mainly to get light upon a larger question. I enjoyed the conservative argument of the Senator upon his cardinal proposition; I did not fully enjoy his impassioned declaration and the setting, to use his own language, of the ninety men here against the nine men of the Supreme Court; and I wish to ask the Senator, without seeking to commit him to any proposition upon what is, I believe, the overshadowing and overmastering question in connection with this subject—the final jurisdiction of the court—whether, in any way, what he has said is to be considered as committing himself against the broadest final review by the courts of all questions under the Constitution and laws that arise in any given case? I go with the Senator in the preliminary stage that we may limit and control and adjust the operations of the inferior courts, but I hope that the Senator, in arraying, as I thought he did, in very eloquent and impassioned language, the nine men against the ninety, did not mean to be considered as in any way committing himself against the broadest final review under the Constitution and law by the Supreme Court.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine misunderstood, though it must have been my fault, what I meant by contrasting the ninety with the nine. I was only insisting that the judgment of ninety men with intellect and character enough to be chosen Senators upon any question of natural right and justice is to be preferred over the judgment of any nine men. That was the whole purpose for which I made that comparison, and before I conclude I shall express myself upon the other question raised by the Senator from Maine.

My friend, the Senator from Wisconsin, quoted Judge Miller, whose reputation he said had added to the just fame of the Supreme Court of the United States. I concur in that eulogy of Justice Miller, and I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will accept the doctrine of his book. Judge Miller says, on page 335 of his work on the Constitution of the United States:

Therefore it was that immediately after the organization of the Government Congress did create courts, define their constitution, and regulate their administration. It is, however, a noteworthy fact that up to within a very few years a large body of this judicial power—a large body of this judicial power which is within the control of Congress under these provisions of the Constitution was vested in no court at all, and consequently could not be exercised by a Federal court.

Not jurisdiction—

Judge Miller says that a large part of the judicial power was not vested by Congress in any court, and, therefore, that a large part of the judicial power could not be exercised by any court.

That doctrine goes further than I have gone, though not further than I am perfectly willing to go. I am only asserting that the courts can not proceed in the face of a prohibition. Judge Miller, Judge Cooley, and Judge Story all assert they can not proceed without the permission of Congress.

Curtis, in his Commentaries, lays down the same doctrine:

So, also, it has been held that the circuit courts in the several States have no power to issue a mandamus to an officer of the United States, although a mandamus is a common-law process to compel the performance of an official duty.

The Senator from Wisconsin declares that a mandamus is the same to the common law that an injunction is to a court of equity; and he is correct. Mandamus is the arm of the common law, just as injunction is the arm of a court of equity. Curtis says:

So, also, it has been held—

And he might have added it has been held repeatedly—that the circuit courts of the several States have no power to issue a mandamus to an officer of the United States, although a mandamus is a common-law process to compel the performance of an official duty. But, at the same time, it appears also to have been held that the authority to issue this writ is within the scope of the judicial power of the United States; that it has not been communicated to the circuit courts in the several States, but that it is possessed by the circuit court for the District of Columbia as a court of general common-law powers.

I shall refer later on to the very cases in which it was so held, in one of which Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court.

Finally, I have here Conkling's work on the United States courts, and the doctrine is not stated anywhere more accurately than it is in this work.

The principle is this: That the circuit courts possess no powers—except such as both the Constitution and the acts of Congress concur in conferring upon them.

Not jurisdiction—

Nothing could be more accurate than that. The circuit courts can exercise no power not conferred by Congress. Congress can confer no power not authorized by the Constitution. Therefore the statement that the Congress and the Constitution must concur in conferring the power.

"In other words, to enable them to act in any given case, it is not sufficient that such case falls within the scope of the judicial power of the United States, as declared in the Constitution, unless jurisdiction over it has been conferred by some act of Congress. Nor, on the other hand, is it sufficient that the case is thus embraced within some legislative act, unless it also appears that it belongs to one of the classes or descriptions of cases enumerated in the Constitution.

This important doctrine, though under one of its aspects, particularly, it has been strenuously contested, is now definitely settled upon the most stable basis.

He lived and wrote before the Senators from Pennsylvania and Wisconsin had delivered their remarkable speeches.

THE SUPREME COURT DECIDES.

Mr. President, I come now to the decisions of the court, and before presenting the cases on which I rely I will recur for a moment to the case of ex parte Crane for the purpose of showing that this attempted distinction between judicial power and jurisdiction is not more clearly negatived in any of the cases than it is in the very extract which the Senator from Wisconsin read from the opinion of Justice Baldwin in that case. It will be remembered that I called especial attention to the fact in another connection that the Senator from Wisconsin had printed in italics Justice Baldwin's declaration that "Congress is bound to provide by law for its exercise in all cases to which that judicial power extends." It will also be remembered that I emphasized for another purpose that in the very same sentence, a part of which the Senator from Wisconsin has emphasized by italics, Justice Baldwin admits that Congress had not provided by law for the exercise of the judicial power to its utmost limit, and he added that "much of it remains dormant for the want of legislation to enable the courts to exercise it." In every line which the Senator from Wisconsin quoted from that opinion it is made manifest that Justice Baldwin did not take into acount any distinction between jurisdiction and judicial power.

The first case directly on this point is that of Turner v. Bank of North America, reported in 4 Dallas, and decided by Chief Justice Ellsworth, who, as I now recall, was a member of the committee which framed the first judiciary act, and was also, I believe, a member of the convention which framed the Constitution. While this case was being argued at the bar, one of the counsel pursued precisely the same line of argument that has been pursued by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Pennsylvania. It was a Pennsylvania lawyer of great distinction and scholarship who tried to impose upon the court in that day the same doctrine which the Senator from Pennsylvania is striving to impose upon the Senate in this day. Mr. Rawle said:

> It is, then, to be remarked that the judicial power is the grant of the Constitution; and Congress can no more limit than enlarge the constitutional grant.

Rawle insisted that "the judicial power is the grant of the Constitution." While he was making that argument, Judge Chase interrupted him, and the reporter incorporates this interruption of Judge Chase in a footnote:

> The notion has frequently been entertained that the Federal courts derive their judicial power immediately from the Constitution, but the political truth is, that the disposal of—

What? Jurisdiction? No.

> But the political truth is that the disposal of the judicial power (except in a few specified instances) belongs to Congress. If Congress has given the power to this court, we possess it, not otherwise; and if Congress has not given the power to us, or to any other court, it still remains at the legislative disposal.

Judge Chase did not say that the courts possess only such jurisdiction as Congress has conferred, but he distinctly says that the courts can exercise only such judicial power as Congress has given them. Rawle was not arguing that jurisdiction was conferred by the Constitution. The argument at bar and the interruption from the bench were upon the question of the judicial power of the Constitution. That interruption was afterwards repeated and approved by the court.

I will next read to the Senate an extract from the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in the Bollman case. My friend the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] brought this case to the attention of the Senate, but it will bear repeating. This was a case in which Bollman and Swartwout were charged with treason and were incarcerated in a prison of the District of Columbia. The lawyers in that case had made this same argument, that the Federal Courts derive their power to issue a writ of habeas corpus from the Constitution. Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court, uses this language:

> Courts which originate in the common law possess a jurisdiction which must be regulated by the common law until some statute shall change their established principles.

Judge Marshall there recognizes the power of the law-making department to change even the established principles of a court existing under the common law:

> But courts which are created by written law, and whose jurisdiction is defined by written law, can not transcend that jurisdiction. It is unnecessary to state the reasoning on which this opinion is founded, because it has been repeatedly given by this court, and with the decisions heretofore rendered on this point, no member of the bench has, even for an instant, been dissatisfied. The reasoning from the bar in relation to it may be answered by the single observation, that for the meaning of the term "habeas corpus," resort may unquestionably be had to the common law.

The attorney had argued that if he did not go to the common law, he would not be able to determine what a writ of habeas corpus meant.

Chief Justice Marshall was answering that when he said:

> The reasoning from the bar, in relation to it, may be answered by the single observation that for the meaning of the term "habeas corpus" resort may unquestionably be had to the common law. But the power to award the writ by any of the courts of the United States must be given by written law.

Will Senators contend that Congress can not restrain the right to issue an injunction, which is a mere writ to preserve a property right, and yet admit the power of Congress to deny the right of the court to issue this great writ of liberty? The Senators from Wisconsin and Pennsylvania say that Congress can not deny the court the right to issue an injunction, but Marshall said that the court can not issue even the great writ of habeas corpus unless authorized to do so by the written law of Congress. He does not, either, overlook the fact that the Constitution provides against its suspension, because in the second paragraph from the one which I have read he declares that the every statute which he was construing was written by men then Members of Congress who had served as members of the convention that had denied the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus except in cases when the public safety might require it. Yet he proceeds:

> To enable the court to decide on such question the power to determine it must be given by written law. The inquiry, therefore, on this motion will be, whether by any statute, compatible with the Constitution of the United States, the power to award a writ of habeas corpus in such a case as that of Erick Bollman and Samuel Swartwout has been given to this court.

Chief Justice Marshall says that the courts can not award the writ of habeas corpus without statutory authority. The Senators from Wisconsin and Pennsylvania say Congress can not deny the right to issue a preliminary injunction.

I have shown that the court has decided that a writ of habeas corpus can not be issued without the authority of Congress. I now propose to show that it has also decided that a mandamus can not be issued without the authority of Congress. Here is the case of McIntire v. Wood, decided in 7 Cranch, in which the court says:

> This court is of opinion that the circuit court did not possess the power to issue the mandamus moved for.

And then, after discussing it, they finally conclude in these words, and I invite particular attention to this expression:

> But although the judicial power of the United States extends to cases arising under the laws of the United States, the legislature have not thought proper to delegate the exercise of that power to its circuit courts, except in certain specified cases.

Senators say that Congress has no right to deprive the courts of such a power; but this case says that the courts have no right to exercise it unless Congress has delegated it to them. The question there was the right of a citizen to a writ of mandamus to compel an officer of the United States to perform what was claimed to be a clerical duty. But the court did not inquire whether it was the duty of the officer or not, and said it was excluded from that inquiry because the right to issue the writ of mandamus did not fall within any statute.

In the Bank of Columbia v. Oakley (4 Wheaton) occurs this expression, to which I invite attention:

> The forms of administering justice and the duties and powers of courts as incident to the exercise of a branch of sovereign power, must ever be subject to legislative will, and the power over them is inalienable, so as to bind subsequent legislatures.

Not only is it subject to the legislative will, but it must forever remain so.

The next case is McClung v. Silliman, reported in 6 Wheaton, and it is the case of McIntire v. Wood under a different style. The court in that case said:

> Both the argument of counsel, and the opinion of the court, distinctly show that the power to issue the mandamus in that case was contended for as incident to the judicial powers of the United States. And the reply of the court is that though, argumenti gratia, it be admitted that this controlling power over its ministerial officers would follow from vesting in its courts the whole judicial power of the United States, the argument fails here, since the legislature has only made a partial delegation of its judicial powers to the circuit courts.

They tried to procure the writ of mandamus in the case of Wood v. McIntire in one way and failed. They went back and brought an action in the State court, and the new case finally reached the Supreme Court of the United States, and was disposed of in an opinion which asserts that, although under the judicial power as defined in the Constitution the award of a mandamus in that case could have been authorized, it had not been authorized by any statute and therefore the court had no power to issue it.

The next is the case of Kendall v. The United States in 12 Peters. Here the courts says:

> The result of these cases—

They had discussed the cases of McIntire v. Wood, of McClung v. Silliman, and the old case of Marbury v. Madison, which involved the right of the Supreme Court to issue a mandamus as an exercise of original jurisdiction—

> The result of these cases, then, clearly is that the authority to issue the writ of mandamus to an officer of the United States, commanding him to perform a specific act required by a law of the United States, is within the scope of the judicial powers of the United States under the Constitution. But that the whole of that power has not been com- municated by law to the circuit courts, or, in other words, that it was then a dormant power, not yet called into action and vested in those courts.

The next case is that of Cary v. Curtis, 3 Howard. The Senator from Wisconsin paid me the poor compliment of saying that although I used this case in the original argument, he could see nothing pertinent either in the question decided or in the opinion. I beg his attention while I read it again. Here is the language:

Secondly, in the doctrines so often ruled in this court, that the judicial power of the United States, although it has its origin in the Constitution, is (except in enumerated instances, applicable exclusively to this court) dependent for its distribution and organization, and for the modes of its exercise, entirely upon the action of Congress, who possesses the sole power of creating the tribunals (inferior to the Supreme Court) for the exercise of the judicial power, and of investing them with jurisdiction, either limited, concurrent, or exclusive, and of withholding jurisdiction from them in the exact degrees and character which to Congress may seem proper for the public good.

They use the words "judicial power" and "jurisdiction" there, as they do in nearly all the cases, as synonymous. If they use the words "judicial power" in the first part of the sentence, for the sake of avoiding a repetition of the same words the next time they use the word "jurisdiction," and if they use the word "jurisdiction" first, for the sake merely of the literary excellence of the opinion, they then use the different words "judicial power" in the second expression. But they use them interchangeably and as synonyms. Further on the court said:

Perfectly consistent with such an admission is the truth, that the organization of the judicial power, the definition and distribution of the subjects of jurisdiction in the Federal tribunals, and the modes of their action and authority have been, and of right must be, the work of the legislature. The existence of the judicial act itself, with its several supplements, furnishes proof unanswerable on this point.

The court in this opinion further declares—

The courts of the United States are all limited in their nature and constitution—

You can not find broader words of limitation on a court than these—and have not the powers inherent in courts existing by prescription or by the common law.

The Senator from Pennsylvania, in the course of his speech, contends that Congress can not deprive inferior Federal courts of what he calls "their inherent function of a court of equity." That is the first objection which he makes to the amendment that I had the honor to offer. Here are his words:

It is not my purpose, Mr. President, to discuss at length the proposition involved in the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Texas, which raises the question of the power of Congress to prevent the circuit courts of the United States from exercising what I deem to be an inherent function of a court of equity.

Justice Daniel says in this Carey v. Curtis opinion that the courts of the United States have no inherent power. Chief Justice Marshall declares the same thing, in effect, in the Bollman case; and I will show that the same doctrine was expressly approved in Fink v. O'Neil.

The next case was Sheldon v. Sill, and there the court uses this language:

It must be admitted that if the Constitution had ordained and established the inferior courts, and distributed to them their respective powers, they could not be restricted or divested by Congress. But as it has made no such distribution, one of two consequences must result—either that each inferior court created by Congress must exercise all the judicial powers not given to the Supreme Court, or that Congress, having the power to establish the courts, must define their respective jurisdictions.

Again I invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that the words "judicial power," the words "the power of the court," and the word "jurisdiction" are used here as perfectly synonymous.

The first of these inferences has never been asserted—

The learned justice had not heard or read the speeches of the Senators from Wisconsin and Pennsylvania when he made that declaration—and could not be defended with any show of reason, and if not the latter would seem to follow as a necessary consequence. And it would seem to follow, also, that, having a right to prescribe, Congress may withhold from any court of its creation jurisdiction of any of the enumerated controversies. Courts created by statute can have no jurisdiction but such as the statute confers.

Now, listen!

The Constitution has defined the limits of the judicial power of the United States, but has not prescribed how much of it shall be exercised by the circuit courts. Consequently the statute—which does prescribe the limits of their jurisdiction can not be in conflict with the Constitution unless it confers powers not enumerated therein.

Except that I am unwilling to impose upon the patience of the Senate, I would read at length from the argument of counsel in this case. Those lawyers made much the same argument to the court which these Senators are now making to the Senate, and at the risk of being tedious I will repeat a brief extract from their argument.

This judicial power, therefore, to take cognizance of this case, is, by the Constitution, vested in the circuit court, and the plaintiff claims the constitutional right to have his controversy with Mr. Sheldon, living in Michigan, decided by that court. Congress has said, by the provision above referred to, that there are certain controversies between citizens of different States which the United States courts shall not take cognizance of; yet the judicial power of the court extends to them by the Constitution, and citizens of the different States have the right to have that power exercised in their controversies. Where does Congress get the power or authority to deprive the courts of the United States of the judicial power with which the Constitution has invested them? Congress may create the courts, but they are clothed with their powers by the Constitution, and we submit that the provision of the act of Congress materially conflicts with the provisions of the Constitution and is void.

To all of which the court replied then exactly as I am replying now; and again I call attention to the fact that in one place they speak of judicial power, while in another they say "how much of it;" and then in the conclusion they use the word "jurisdiction," plainly referring to the same power of the court as in the expressions which had preceded.

If there could be any doubt on that point, that doubt is removed on the next page of the same opinion where they quote with approval the interruption of Judge Chase in the case of Turner v. The Bank of North America and say:

But the court said: "The political truth is, that the disposal of the judicial power (except in a few specified instances) belongs to Congress, and Congress is not bound to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Federal courts to every subject, in every form which the Constitution might warrant."

Next, Mr. President, is the Sewing Machine case, and the language of that is just as explicit as it is in the other cases which I have quoted. It declares that—

Circuit courts do not derive their judicial power directly from the Constitution.

The Senator from Wisconsin called particular attention to the statement of the court in the Sewing Machine case that the judicial power has its origin in the Constitution. The court said the same thing in Cary v. Curtis; and the same is true of all Federal power. If the President of the United States is commanded by a statute to perform a duty, he does not derive his power to act from the Constitution, though that be the source of all Federal power. He derives his power from the statute. Of course, if the statute is repugnant to the Constitution, he may refuse to obey it, and his defense is not that he derives his power from the Constitution, but that the Constitution limits the power of Congress and that Congress in passing that statute had transcended the limits of its power. No governmental power can be exercised by any public officer in this country, except by the President in several instances, unless that power is conferred by statute. All Federal power has its origin in the Constitution, but the Constitution would, in many instances, be a dead letter unless Congress breathed into it the breath of life.

In 1873 Congress passed a law, a very extraordinary law in some respects, looking to the protection of the Government against the Union Pacific Railroad. The constitutionality of that act was assailed upon several grounds and sustained by the court in an opinion, during the course of which they use these words:

The question for decision is, therefore, squarely presented to us, as it was to the circuit court, whether, by the aid of that statute, and within the limits of the power it intended to confer, this bill can be sustained under the general principles of equity jurisprudence.

We say, "by the aid of that statute," because it is conceded on all sides that without it the bill can not stand. The service of compulsory process on a party residing without the limits of the district of Connecticut, who is not found within them, is expressly forbidden by the general statute defining the jurisdiction of the circuit courts. Parties and subjects of complaint having no proper connection with each other are grouped together in this bill, and they, by the accepted canons of equity pleading, render it multifarious. This and other matters of like character which are proper causes of demurrer are fatal to it, unless the difficulty be cured by the statute.

When we recur to its provisions, which are said to authorize these and other departures from the general rules of equity procedure, counsel for the appellees insist that it is unconstitutional, not only in the particulars just alluded to, but that it is absolutely void as affecting the substantial rights of defendants in regard to matters beyond the power of Congress. (United States v. Union Pacific R. R. Co., 98 U. S. Reports, pp. 601–602.)

Then follows matter not especially material here, and the court, coming again to this question, says:

The same article declares, in section 1, that this "power shall be vested—

And that is the judicial power—in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain."

The discretion, therefore, of Congress as to the number, the character, the territorial limits of the courts among which it shall distribute this judicial power is unrestricted except as to the Supreme Court.

I will reread this last sentence:

The discretion, therefore, of Congress as to the number, the character, the territorial limits of the courts among which it shall distribute this judicial power is unrestricted except as to the Supreme Court.

And they held this statute which was contrary to the practice and proceedings in equity to be valid in that respect.

I want now to call the attention of the Senate to the case of Fink v. O'Neil. That case declares—indeed, decides—that the courts of the United States have no power to issue executions on their judgments except such power be given by the laws of Congress. The court had the power—the jurisdiction, if you prefer it—to read the pleadings, to examine the witnesses, to hear the argument of counsel, to render a judgment, and yet it required an act of Congress to authorize it to execute its own judgment by final process. Will the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Pennsylvania insist that the right to issue a preliminary injunction is more essential to the nature and the constitution of a court than the right to issue a final execution? Its judgment would be a barren right, or as Justice Mathews correctly said, "a right without the means of vindication," unless the court could issue its final process, and yet in the face of that decision which solemnly declares that in the absence of Congressional authority the court has no power to execute its final judgment, these Senators contend that Congress is incompetent to require the court to suspend all judgment until it is ready to render a final one.

That opinion asserts that the court could not render any judgment at all without a statute enabling it to do so, and they held in that very case that the Congressional limitation upon the power to issue an execution defeated a sovereign right. The court said—and the court did not need to say that in order to give every Senator here to know that it is true—that the statute of exemptions could not prevail against the sovereign. But as the court had no power to issue execution at all, except in conformity with the law of Congress, that law of Congress destroyed the right of the sovereign to disregard this privilege of the citizen. And so the effect of that decision, as well as the words of that opinion, is with those who believe that Congress can limit the right to issue an injunction. The court declared that unless they issued execution in accordance with the law of Congress they had no power to issue it at all; but it had not then been advised of this new doctrine promulgated by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Pennsylvania to the effect that whenever a court has jurisdiction of any case it may issue any writ necessary to the efficient exercise of that jurisdiction notwithstanding the law of Congress.

It is a safe rule of construction to say that if you give a court the power to do a thing you include whatever power is necessary to the doing of that thing. That, however, is included, not under any constitutional command, but under a rule of construction as old as statutes and which Congress has the power to overrule by express enactment. The court in the case of Fink v. O'Neil goes further than I have gone and further than it is necessary for me to go in this argument. There the court declares that without the statute it could not execute its own judgment; yet the power to execute its judgment is a most essential power in all courts; there is reason to regard it as more essential even than the power to punish for contempt, because the court might proceed without that power. It would be as turbulent, perhaps, as a barroom on occasions, but in this American Republic and among these enlightened people, if the courts were powerless to punish for contempt, the self-respect of those who attend their sessions would generally preserve their order. But, Mr. President, if after hearing the witnesses, after applying the law, and after pronouncing its judgment, the court had no power to execute that judgment, it would be impotent indeed. It would be useless, it would be a mockery, it would be a burlesque upon civilization to give courts the right to adjudicate controversies and then prevent them from enforcing their adjudication, and Congress will never commit such an act of folly. But the court correctly says in this case of Fink v. O'Neil that unless Congress has authorized them to issue the execution they are powerless to do so. Why? Now listen:

> For, as was said by Mr. Justice Daniel, in Cary v. Curtis, "the courts of the United States are all limited in their nature and constitution, and have not the power inherent in courts existing by prescription or by the common law."

Mr. President, I can safely vest the power of Congress to forbid inferior Federal courts to issue preliminary injunctions, upon the existence of a statute as old as this Government and on the authority of an unbroken line of decisions of the Supreme Court, speaking through its greatest justices and its greatest Chief Justice. What Marshall has said none of us need apologize for saying, for in spite of my different convictions in politics, in spite of the fact that I believe he nationalized this Republic where the fathers intended only to federalize it, in spite of the fact that I do not agree with a single political opinion which he ever expressed from the bench or during his brief political career, I accord to him the honor of being first among all the Chief Justices of this Republic, and I believe his was the greatest legal mind that ever illuminated the judicial history of this or any other country. With him to sustain my contention, and with a long line of his illustrious associates declaring that these inferior Federal courts possess no power except what the laws of Congress have conferred upon them, I may well be content with my opinion though no other Senator should agree with me.

When Marshall says that the great writ of habeas corpus, beneath whose protecting care only can the citizen stand secure, can not issue except it be authorized by an act of Congress, Mr. President, I may be excused for saying that Congress has the power to deny to an inferior court the right to issue a preliminary injunction. When Marshall says that the writ of mandamus, a writ as ancient as that of injunction—and upon the authority of the Senator from Wisconsin I may be permitted to add as necessary to a court of law as the writ of injunction is to a court of equity—when Marshall and his associates say that without authority from Congress the Federal courts can not issue that writ I must be pardoned if I therefore infer that against the command of Congress a Federal court can not issue a preliminary injunction. When I see that Congress has prohibited Federal courts from issuing injunctions, may I not insist that it shall again prohibit them in a case of vast importance to the people?

If it were a doubtful power I would not invoke it; if it were a strained construction of the Constitution I would not plead for it, but if it is a power which Congress possesses, let us see what reason there is to exercise it.

NO ATTACK UPON THE COURTS.

Senators on the other side seem to think that because we insist that the judgment of the Commission shall stand until after a full investigation we imply a distrust of all the courts. Distrust of the capacity of all courts for this work, yes; distrust of the integrity of all courts, no. I trust may of our courts implicitly; but some of them I do not trust at all. Some of them I know have abused their power; and as we can not leave the power with those who will not abuse it and take it from those who will abuse it, it becomes necessary to take it from all in order to prevent its abuse by any.

Let us see how much of force and justice there is in this argument that we are attacking the courts. A court is presumed to be learned in the law, and a man who is very learned in the law is seldom very learned in any other specialty. I believe it was Lord Eldon who, when a friend inquired of him how he could make his ward a great lawyer, answered, in the language of Milton, "'Teach him 'to scorn delights and live laborious days.'" The observance of that rule has been found necessary from my Lord Eldon's time to this in order to make a great lawyer; and no man ought to be made a judge until after he has made himself a great lawyer.

Take one man of high character and great ability and put him on the bench, thus making it his duty to devote his days and nights to a study of the law. Then take another man of equal character and ability and put him on a railroad commission, and make it his duty to study railroad rates. The judge will have many cases to try, a multitude of law books to read, and endless papers to examine. If all of that be well done, he will have no time for an examination into the justice and fairness of railroad rates. The railroad commissioner, a man of character and ability equal to that of the judge—and if we can not get commissioners equal to some of our Federal judges, God save the Republic—will devote himself to the study of railroad rates, while the judge is pursuing through dusty volumes the science of the law. Who will be the best qualified at the end of three years to fix a railroad rate—the judge, who the more he knows about the law the less he will be apt to know about the railroads, or the railroad commissioner, who has been studying railroad rates instead of law? It is certain that the judge would be the best qualified to decide the law, and it is equally as certain that the commissioner would be best qualified to establish a railroad rate. I do not believe there is a Senator in this body—and I know there is not a Senator who ought to be a member of this body—who will contend that the judge would be better prepared than the commissioner for that work; and if there is anybody here who believes it, I want to warn him that there is nobody elsewhere who believes it. But notwithstanding the superior qualification of the commissioner over the judge for the task of fixing railroad rates, we recognize that under the Constitution the commissioner's work must at last be subject to the judge's scrutiny; and we only demand that the judge shall not be permitted to set aside, without a thorough inquiry, what the commissioner has done with infinite care and labor.

They tell me that great injustice may be inflicted on the railroads under my proposed amendment, and I answer that a greater injustice may be inflicted upon the people unless my amendment or some other like it is adopted. Suppose the Commission fixes a rate, and a Federal court suspends it by preliminary injunction. Then suppose at the end of two years the courts finally adjudge that the rate fixed by the Commission was a proper one. What is the result? During those two years 10,000 American citizens have been compelled to pay the railroads more than a just compensation for their service. Of course every one of those citizens can go into their court and sue the railroad for the excess, and the proponents of this measure as it stands seem to think that is sufficient. But they seem to forget that if we deny the courts the power to suspend the Commission's rate, and it shall finally be decided that the Commission's rate was too low, the railroad can recover the deficiency just as the shipper can recover the excess. It is, sir, a poor rule which will not work both ways.

Under my plan, if the Commission's rate should be condemned, the railroad would be compelled to sue ten thousand shippers in order to recover the deficiency, while under the bill as it came from the House, if the Commission's rate should be suspended by a preliminary injunction and then finally sustained, ten thousand shippers would be compelled to sue the railroad in order to recover the excess. Is it worse that the railroad should be required to sue ten thousand shippers than that ten thousand shippers shall be required to sue the railroad?

As a matter of practical convenience the railroad can very much more easily sue 10,000 people than 10,000 people can sue the railroad, because the railroad has its established legal staff; it has its records to show what every man paid, and what every man ought to have paid, and that is the exact measure of its damage. On the other hand, the citizen has no regular legal staff. He has been compelled to pay the excessive freight to the merchant, who paid it first, and then charged it to his customer. The consumer who has really paid it would have no standing in court, because there was no contract or relation between him and the carrier. He would have to go to the merchant, and the merchant would have to go to the carrier. But wholly aside from this consideration I marvel at a course of reasoning which leads men to believe that it is more unjust for the railroad to sue 10,000 people than for 10,000 people to sue the railroad.

This brings me, Mr. President, to the question of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and when I have answered that I am through with this long and tedious speech. I do not believe that the courts are the best tribunals in which to settle this question, but I know that under the Constitution we can not deny a common carrier the right to a trial in the courts. I am not so sure, however, that such ought to be the law. I say that because the books contain many decisions which hold that when the railroad wants to condemn a citizen's property in order to construct and operate its line it has the right to do so, and the award of the commissioners appointed upon its application may be made final. It has frequently been held that such a proceeding is according to the due process of law, and that the ascertainment by those commissioners of the just compensation which the law requires is conclusive, or can be made conclusive, upon all parties.

I know that this doctrine has not been universally accepted, and, from intimations in the opinions of the Supreme Court, I do not believe they would accept it in its application to this question. But I confess myself utterly unable to understand the rule of law which permits three commissioners to finally decide the value of my property when the railroad wants to take it, and denies that the award of five commissioners can be conclusive as to the value of the railroad's service when I want to use it.

The truth is, and the truth must always remain, that from the power and right of the railroad to condemn my property for its use results my right to condemn the service of the railroad to my use. The railroad comes to my homestead, consecrated by a thousand associations of mother and father, of wife and children, and mocks me when I talk about the sweet and tender memories of my childhood and plead with them to go another way. They tell me that private interest and private sentiment must yield to this great public convenience; and when I refuse to agree with them upon the compensation, they apply to the county judge, and he appoints, in many of the States, three commissioners to view the premises and assess the value of my land. I plead with those commissioners; but they read me the cold, unfeeling letter of the law, and tell me that private property shall not stand in the way of public progress and convenience. They find that I am entitled to so much. If I am dissatisfied, they tell me to appeal to the court, and I appeal, but pending that appeal they pay me what the three commissioners have awarded me, and they enter upon my land, tear down my fences, or, if it obstructs their way, they raze my house, and I must litigate with them in the courts the question of whether they have paid me enough for my property.

I have in mind—and I am permitted to make a statement from my professional experience, as the Senator from Wisconsin did from his—I have in mind one case where the owner of a splendid farm said "Keep out of this bottom and build on the table-land, and you can have the right of way for nothing." They said it would cost $3,000 to change the location of their line, and upon the mere consideration of the cost refused to make the change. The railroad offered $1,000 for the right of way, and the owner demanded $5,000. Under this disagreement commissioners were appointed, and these commissioners assessed the damages at only $1,500. In that state of the case the railroad paid the owner of the land the $1,500—and if he had not been willing to accept it they could have deposited it in the court—tore down his fences, and built their railroad through his farm. He appealed to the court, and when the case was tried a jury of his countrymen said the damages were $5,000. How did the owner of the farm obtain the additional $3,500? He obtained his judgment against the railroad, and collected it like other judgment creditors.

I would charge the commission with the duty of allowing to the railroad a just compensation for its service. Of course some men say that is too indefinite, but, Mr. President, it is not more indefinite than the words "just and reasonable," because the words "just and reasonable" mean, and they must be construed by the court to mean, the same as "just compensation." The Senator from Wisconsin argued with great force—and that is one part of his speech with which I agree—that we are limited by the fifth amendment to the Constitution in dealing with this question. As the fifth amendment provides that "private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation," I thought it best for the statute to follow the language of the Constitution. Not only is it the language of the Federal Constitution, but out of the forty-five State constitutions it is the language of twenty-nine. I believe that there are but three State constitutions which do not provide either for "just" or "adequate" compensation. There is not a single constitution that provides for the taking of private property at a "just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative price." If you strike out the words "fairly remunerative" I would not contend a moment for the difference between a "just and reasonable rate" and "a rate that affords a just compensation," because they are the absolute equivalents of each other. I propose that the railroads shall have just compensation for their service, and I demand that the people shall have proper service for the just compensation which they are compelled to pay.

I open the door of the court and authorize any railroad or any person dissatisfied with any rate or regulation established by the Commission to go into the court and allege that the Commission have not fixed a rate which allows a just compensation, or that they have not established a practice or regulation which is just and reasonable. I give the court the power to hear and determine that question, and I only provide that what the Commission has done shall remain effective until they have proved that what the Commission has done is wrong.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. HALE. As the Senator in passing was referring to what may be a practical question of delay, I wanted to suggest to him whether the feature of preference if given in these cases, as it is now given by law to a certain class of cases, in the consideration finally of the subject by the court, would not to a great degree remove the objection of delay and yet not improperly precipitate the action of the court.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true, and I attempted to cover it, and it is just as much in favor of the railroads as it is in favor of the railroad commission.

Mr. HALE. Precisely.

Mr. BAILEY. In other words, the fact that the railroad can get an early decision reduces the injustice which may be wrought against it if the order of the commission is unjust.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BAILEY. I have sought to reduce the injustice both ways.

Mr. HALE. Now, if the Senator will not consider——

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me to add a word just here?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. One of the very purposes, aside from its intrinsic justice, that I had in mind when I incorporated this provision in the amendment is to force the railroads to favor an early trial, and that is the only way to do it—to make it to their interest. Perhaps that would be true of all others as well as of the railroads.

Mr. HALE. Now, if the Senator will allow me, I want to say that this day has been most profitably spent, and that the thorough discussion by the Senator from Texas of the particular feature which he has so much at heart and what he has said later with reference to the final adjudication of all questions by the courts, have tended more to disentangle this subject and to secure, I will not say an immediate, but a near beneficent result than anything that has taken place.

The debate has all been most able and illuminating. I think—and I speak with some hesitation, because I know that great lawyers in the Senate will not agree—that the Senator's argument as to the power of inferior courts and their liability to be considered and controlled by Congress can not be countervailed. That great lawyers here will take the other view I have no doubt. I believe that that is the law. But that is a minor question.

The final question has been stated by the Senator from Texas better than I can state it. It is that after the Commission has passed upon a question and it is taken, without undue delay and with the right of injunction limited by Congress, to the courts, the court shall consider all the questions. The Senator is right in saying——

Mr. ALDRICH. The circuit court.

Mr. HALE. Finally the Supreme Court—that is, if it gets so far as that. The Senator is right in saying whether it shall be "just compensation" or "just and reasonable" or any other term, is not of importance; that the court will settle it all and will finally decide.

I look out of this controversy—I have not taken much part in it—hopefully to this general result. The Commission will be strengthened. I think it ought to be. I find no fault personally with it, but I think it is better, in the view the Senator has expressed, that we should have as good men upon that Commission as there are on the circuit courts or even on supreme courts. I think, out of this we will get a strengthened Commission. I will vote that its decision shall not be interfered with by injunction until it reaches the final court; and then I believe the Senate will agree to the proposition that that review by the court shall be of the broadest and most ample kind. That the Senator has largely contributed to this beneficent result is to me very plain.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, it is gratifying, of course, to have the approval of the Senator from Maine, and to know that he agrees with me upon this most stubbornly contested point. This discussion may not be without some value, and perhaps it is a fortunate circumstance that the people of the United States should again have their attention directed to the power of their representatives as well as to the power of their courts.

My great regret is that I have not been able to agree with some lawyers in this body whose judgment upon a question of law I have been in the habit of receiving with perfect confidence. We go to the books for an answer to each other, and yet—and I say it in no spirit of flattery, Mr. President—I would as soon accept the deliberate, unbiased, and matured opinion of the Senator from Wisconsin or the Senator from Pennsylvania as to accept the opinion of any text writer whom I have quoted here to-day. Knowing their great accomplishments and their great learning in their profession, it was a matter of profound surprise to me when I found that both had taken a position never before successfully maintained in Congress or before the courts.

The contention that Federal courts derive their powers from the Constitution is not a new one. It has been pressed upon our highest court by the ablest lawyers who have ever practiced before that great tribunal, but it has always been rejected. I am compelled to belive that those Senators expressed their opinions without due consideration, and now they hate to yield. I will not call it stubbornness. I am willing to call it intellectual firmness. You know, Mr. President, the difference between firmness and stubbornness is that our enemies describe the same quality as stubbornness which our friends describe as firmness. I am constrained to believe that the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Pennsylvania having committed themselves to this theory are defending it with all the power they possess; and if any two men in the Senate or any two men at the American bar can successfully defend it, they can.

And yet, sir, much as I regret my difference with them, it has been a matter of sincere satisfaction to me that so many who at first denied my proposition have now assented to it. When I first announced it in the Senate, rather in an incidental way, I had no thought of the clamorous dissent that was so soon to assail me on every side. I do not know exactly, nor is it material that I should say, when I first learned that Congress possessed this power, but if I had not been so absolutely sure of my position the first time I went into the cloakroom I would have fled from it as from a pestilence, because I was met on every side with a demand for authorities and for argument. It is, however, creditable alike to the intellectual candor and to the intellectual strength of the Senate that so many Senators, upon an investigation of the question, have renounced their first opinion and have accepted the law as it has been written by the Congress and construed by all the courts for a century or more.

WHERE THIS LEGISLATION LEADS.

Mr. President, I do not believe that this legislation will lead to the end which some men fear. I believe that its ultimate effect will be to promote a better understanding between the railroads and the people. I believe that when it has made the railroads do the people justice, the people will feel less resentful toward the railroads; and we shall consider these questions with more of reason and less of passion. It will take the railroads out of politics, and we will hear no more about railroad Senators. I want to see the railroads and every other corporation driven from the politics of this Republic. They have no place in the politics. They are organized for profit and can cherish no patriotic purpose. Politics are for men of flesh and blood, made in the image of their God, and not for corporations, which are the mere creations of the law.

And now, Mr. President, if we can pass this bill, amended as it ought to be, with the concurrence of all Senators, I would feel that the political millenium had almost come. I would feel that the railroad and the shipper could work together in peace and with a good will toward each other. I would feel that we could bury the big stick and the pitchfork in a common grave. [Laughter.] I would feel that we are approaching a new era in this devoted land where men are to be judged by how they act and what they think, rather than by what they own; when intellect instead of fortune shall be the measure of our esteem, and when an honest fame shall be the goal toward which our ambitious youth will toil and hope.

Mr. President, I am one of those who believe that such a time may come. Of course I am not so simple-minded as to dream that the old bucolic days of small fortunes and great contentment will ever come again to bless the land, but I do believe in the coming of a better day than this, when the poor man who knows that he is just and honest will feel that he is happier in his condition than his more prosperous neighbor whose riches have been corrupted through injustice.

I pray for the time to come when we shall have a new and loftier standard to guide our children; when we shall teach them that justice is better than power, and lead them into the ennobling faith that truth shall conquer falsehood in every home where peace abides and in every land where men are free. Under the influence of higher ideals and more unselfish aspirations all hate and envy will vanish from our minds, and the only evil thought which still must vex us will be the malice which the bad shall forever feel toward the good. When conduct instead of fortune is made the rule by which we judge all men, then every boy in this fair land, no matter how humble his parentage or how limited his opportunity, will feel the thrill of hope, and the carpenter's son will know that if only he is just and brave and honest he will be more respected than the son of any millionaire who ever wasted his father's fortune in idle dissipation or soiled his father's name by gross excesses.

Mr. President, I apologize to the Senate for the length at which I have spoken; I thank the Senators for their long and patient attention, and I am done. [Applause in the galleries.]

APPENDIX.

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. BAILEY to the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, viz: Beginning after the word "what" in line 19, on page 10, strike out all down to and including the word "prescribed" in line 5, on page 11, and insert the following:

A rate or charge which shall afford a just compensation to the carrier or carriers for the service or services to be performed and a regulation or practice which shall be just and reasonable. The rate or charge, regulation or practice so determined and prescribed shall be the only lawful rate or charge, regulation or practice, and the carrier or carriers shall not thereafter demand or collect any other rate or charge or follow any other regulation or practice.

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. BAILEY to the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, viz: Insert the following:

Any carrier, or person, or corporation, party to such complaint, and dissatisfied with the rate or charge, regulation or practice so established and prescribed, may file a bill against the Commission in any circuit court of the United States for the district in which any portion of the line of the carrier or carriers may be located, alleging that such rate or charge will not afford a just compensation for the service or services to be performed, or that the regulation or practice is unjust and unreasonable; and if upon the hearing the court shall find that such rate or charge will not afford a just compensation for the service or services to be performed, or that the regulation or practice is unjust and unreasonable, it shall enjoin the enforcement of the same: Provided, however, That no rate or charge, regulation or practice prescribed by the Commission shall be set aside or suspended by any preliminary or interlocutory decree or order of the court. Said proceedings shall have precedence over all other cases on the docket of a different character, and the court shall have power to make orders to secure the attendance of persons from any part of the United States, and the existing laws relative to evidence and proceedings under the acts to regulate commerce shall be applicable. Either party to said proceeding shall have the right to appeal directly to the Supreme Court of the United States, and such appeal shall have precedence in said Supreme Court over all other cases of a different character pending therein.

Mr. ELKINS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CLAPP. I hope the Senator will withhold that motion.

Mr. CULLOM. I am informed that the Senator from Minnesota is very desirous of disposing of a conference report, and I therefore ask leave to withdraw the motion for an executive session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois withdraws the motion for an executive session.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I desire first to submit a question as to the parliamentary status of the conference report on the bill (H. R. 5976) to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes. I understood until this morning that the objection made by the Senator from Missouri at the time the report was withdrawn still stood.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I submit to the Senator that, after the hours of strain which we have been under (I feel very much fatigued from just following the Senator from Texas, and it must be the same with others), I do not believe he can dispose of the report to-night, and it would be a favor to all of us if he would consent to an executive session. The report is going to excite considerable debate.

Mr. CLAPP. Several Senators have expressed a desire that the Senate should get through with this report, but if it is the sense of Senators, I will gladly put it over until to-morrow morning. I ask unanimous consent that it be taken up at the close of the morning buisness to-morrow.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will be very glad to have that done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is prepared to respond to the Senator's inquiry as to the parliamentary status.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to learn the status.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from Minnesota, as chairman of the conferees on the part of the Senate, has the right to withdraw the conference report in the absence of the yeas and nays having been ordered.

Mr. CLAPP. I did withdraw it.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CLAPP. I understand now that we have a unanimous consent agreement that it is to be taken up at the close of the morning business to-morrow.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator can call it up without asking unanimous consent.

Mr. ALLISON. I merely desire to ask one question. I understand that the report was withdrawn; that the conferees have met again, and are now ready to report.

Mr. CLAPP. We are.

Mr. ALLISON. Therefore I can see no question about the status of the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the report has not been withdrawn.

Mr. CLAPP. I formally withdraw the other report, and submit this one. I ask that it may be published in the RECORD, so as to appear in the morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be received, and will be printed in the RECORD.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5976) to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 8, 14, 15, 16, 28, 29, 44, and 59.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 4, 6, 7, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 17, 22, 23, 24, 25, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 39, 40, 42, 47, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, and 57; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out the word "ninety," in the first line on page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the word "sixty."

Strike out the word "ninety," in the fourth line of page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the word "sixty."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "or freedmen," on line 16 of page 2; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 18: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert after the word "heirs," in line 24 on page 5, the following: "and in case any allottee shall die after restrictions have been removed, his property shall descend to his heirs;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 19: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert after the word "contests," in line 10 of the sixth page, the following: "pending before the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes or the Department of the Interior;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 20: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 20, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of section 6, commencing with line 11 on page 6, down to and including line 2 on page 8, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 6. That if the principal chief of the Choctaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole tribe, or the governor of the Chickasaw tribe, shall refuse or neglect to perform the duties devolving upon him, he may be removed from office by the President of the United States, or if any such executive become permanently disabled, the office may be declared vacant by the President of the United States, who may fill any vacancy arising from removal, disability, or death of the incumbent, by appointment of a citizen by blood of the tribe.

"If any such executive shall fail, refuse, or neglect, for thirty days after notice that any instrument is ready for his signature, to appear at a place to be designated by the Secretary of the Interior and execute the same, such instrument may be approved by the Secretary of the Interior without such execution, and when so approved and recorded shall convey legal title, and such approval shall be conclusive evidence that such executive or chief refused or neglected after notice to execute such instrument.

"Provided, That the principal chief of the Seminole Nation is hereby authorized to execute the deeds to allottees in the Seminole Nation prior to the time when the Seminole government shall cease to exist."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 21: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Insert after the word "auction," in line 11 on page 9, the following: "or by sealed bids;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 26: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert after the word "retaining," in line 9 on page 12, the following: "tribal educational officers, subject to dismissal by the Secretary of the Interior, and;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27 (incorrectly printed 21): That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Insert after the word "five," in line 14 on page 14, the following: "and all such taxes levied and collected after the thirty-first day of December, nineteen hundred and five, shall be refunded."

Insert after the word "shall," in line 22 on page 14, the words: "wilfully and fraudulently."

Insert after the word "punished," in the second line on page 15, the following: "by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 38: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out the words "Secretary of the Interior is," in line 21 on page 17, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "principal chief of the Choctaw Nation and the governor of the Chickasaw Nation are, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

Strike out the words "his direction," in line 24 on page 17, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "the direction of the Secretary of the Interior."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 41: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out from lines 19, 20, and 21 on page 19, the words "upon the dissolution of the tribal governments of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 43: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 43, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "one hundred and sixty," in line 3 on page 21, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "forty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 45: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 45, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out the words "and the same may be pleaded by such party defendants as a counterclaim or set-off," in lines 6 and 7 on page 23.

Strike out the word "amount," in line 7 on said page, and insert in lieu thereof the word "balance."

Insert after the word "such," in line 9 on page 23, the words "tribe or."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 46: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 46, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of section 19 commencing with line 11 on page 23 down to and including line 12 on page 25 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 19. That no full-blood Indian of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole tribes shall have power to alienate, sell, dispose of, or encumber in any manner any of the lands allotted to him for a period of twenty-five years from and after the passage and approval of this act, unless such restriction shall, prior to the expiration of said period, be removed by act of Congress; and for all purposes the quantum of Indian blood possessed by any member of said tribes shall be determined by the rolls of citizens of said tribes approved by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, however, That such full-blood Indians of any of said tribes may lease any lands other than homesteads for more than one year under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior; and in case of the inability of any full-blood owner of a homestead, on account of infirmity or age, to work or farm his homestead, the Secretary of the Interior, upon proof of such inability, may authorize the leasing of such homestead under such rules and regulations: Provided further, That conveyances heretofore made by members of any of the Five Civilized Tribes subsequent to the selection of allotment and subsequent to removal of restriction, where patents thereafter issue, shall not be deemed or held invalid solely because said conveyances were made prior to issuance and recording or delivery of patent or deed; but this shall not be held or construed as affecting the validity or invalidity of any such conveyance, except as hereinbefore provided; and every deed executed before, or for the making of which a contract or agreement was entered into before the removal of restrictions, be and the same is hereby declared void: Provided further, That all lands upon which restrictions are removed shall be subject to taxation, and the other lands shall be exempt from taxation as long as the title remains in the original allottee."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 48: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 48, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert after the words "period of," on line 23 of page 25, the words "more than," and strike out the words "or more" where they occur in said line; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 54: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 54, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "shall," in line 23 on page 27, and insert in lieu thereof the word "may;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 55: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 55, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out the words "electric railway," in line 4 on page 29.

Insert the word "purchase" after the word "condemnation," in line 24 on page 29.

Insert after the word "act," in line 11 on page 30, the following: "Provided, That the purchase from and agreements with individual Indians, where the right of alienation has not heretofore been granted by law, shall be subject to approval by the Secretary of the Interior."

Strike out the words "electric railway," in line 12, page 30.

Insert after the word "Tribes," in line 9 on page 31, the following: "Whenever any such dam or dams, canals, reservoirs and auxiliary steam works, pole lines, and conduits are to be constructed within the limits of any incorporated city or town in the Indian Territory, the municipal authorities of such city or town shall have the power to regulate the manner of construction therein, and nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to deny the right of municipal taxation in such cities and towns."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 56: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 56, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out lines 13 to 25, inclusive, on page 31, all of page 32, and lines 1 to 5, inclusive, on page 33, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 26. That in addition to the powers now conferred by law, all municipalities in the Indian Territory having a population of over two thousand, to be determined by the last census, taken under any provision of law or ordinance of the council of such municipality, are hereby authorized and empowered to order improvements of the streets or alleys or such parts thereof as may be included in an ordinance or order of the common council, with the consent of a majority of the property owners whose property as herein provided is liable to assessment therefor for the proposed improvement; and said council is empowered and authorized to make assessments and levy taxes, with the consent of a majority of the property owners whose property is assessed, for the purpose of grading, paving, macadamizing, curbing, or guttering streets and alleys, or building sidewalks upon and along any street, roadway, or alley within the limits of such municipality, and the cost of such grading, paving, macadamizing, curbing, guttering, or sidewalk constructed, or other improvements under authority of this section, shall be so assessed against the abutting property as to require each parcel of land to bear the cost of such grading, paving, macadamizing, curbing, guttering, or sidewalk, as far as it abuts thereon, and in the case of streets or alleys to the center thereof; and the cost of street intersections or crossings may be borne by the city or apportioned to the quarter blocks abutting thereon upon the same basis. The special assessments provided for by this section and the amounts to be charged against each lot or parcel of land shall be fixed by the city council or under its authority, and shall become a lien on such abutting property, which may be enforced as other taxes are enforced under the laws in force in the Indian Territory. The total amount charged against any tract or parcel of land shall not exceed twenty per centum of its assessed value, and there shall not be required to be paid thereon exceeding one per centum per annum on the assessed value, and interest at six per centum on the deferred payments.

"For the purpose of paying for such improvements the city council of such municipality is hereby authorized to issue improvement script or certificates for the amount due for such improvements, said script or certificates to be payable in annual installments and to bear interest from date at the rate of six per centum per annum, but no improvement script shall be issued or sold for less than its par value. All of said municipalities are hereby authorized to pass all ordinances necessary to carry into effect the above provisions, and for the purpose of doing so may divide such municipality into improvement districts."

Insert after the word "taken," in line 18 on page 33, the words "within sixty days."

Strike out all of page 34 and lines 1 and 2 of page 35.

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 58: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 58, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out lines 14 to 20, inclusive, on page 35, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the tribal existence and present tribal governments of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes or nations are hereby continued in full force and effect for all purposes authorized by law, until otherwise provided by law, but the tribal council or legislature in any of said tribes or nations shall not be in session for a longer period than thirty days in any one year: Provided, That no act, ordinance, or resolution (except resolutions of adjournment) of the tribal council or legislature of any of said tribes or nations shall be of any validity until approved by the President of the United States: Provided further, That no contract involving the payment or expenditure of any money or affecting any property belonging to any of said tribes or nations made by them or any of them or by any officer thereof, shall be of any validity until approved by the President of the United States."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Change the numbering of the last section of the bill to read "Sec. 29."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 10, 1906.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m., and was called to order by its Chief Clerk, Mr. WILLIAM J. BROWNING.

The CHIEF CLERK. Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, in the temporary absence of the Speaker, will some one nominate a Member to act as Speaker pro tempore?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Clerk, I nominate Hon. JOHN DALZELL, of Pennsylvania, to act as Speaker pro tempore.

The CHIEF CLERK. Mr. DALZELL has been nominated. Are there any other nominations?

There were no other nominations. The question was taken; and Mr. DALZELL was unanimously elected Speaker pro tempore.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. OVERSTREET, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16973—the Post-Office appropriation bill—Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield forty minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, on page 22 of the bill now under consideration there is a provision which I should have contented myself with voting to strike out but for the fact that numerous letters, resolutions, and petitions have been sent to me asking me to support it. These petitions, letters, and resolutions come from people whose friendship I prize, whose good opinion I value, and whose judgment I would respect in any matter if they understood the facts. I have taken some occasion to investigate the merits of this provision in the bill, and I wish to state my reasons for opposing it, notwithstanding the sentiment of many of the people who have honored me in favor of it. There are, Mr. Chairman, 200,965 miles of railway in the United States over which the mails are transported at an average cost to the United States of $198.20 per mile per year. From 1885 to 1890 the policy was inaugurated of voting special appropriations for special facilities. The argument of the Postmaster-General at that time was that by granting a special appropriation for two or three years the natural increase in the mails would soon be such that the pay would equal the former pay and the subvention combined. I find on page 269 of the report submitted to Congress, December, 1890, these words:

> If, at the end of two years, all of the special allowance is withdrawn each of the roads will still be receiving for mail transportation more than was allowed by the combining of the regular and special compensation at the inception of the special service.

Under this policy some fifteen or twenty lines received special-facility pay, but from all of them except two the special pay was withdrawn several years ago.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, when these special appropriations from here to New Orleans were first provided, the compensation of the road from Washington to Atlanta was $383,750.87. The special appropriation over and above the regular allowance provided by law from here to Atlanta was about $80,000.

According to the argument of the Post-Office Department, upon which these special appropriations were made, when the mail had increased in volume enough to amount to about $80,000 more than the regular pay amounted to in 1903 that $80,000 more than the regular pay amounted to in 1893 that that it has been continued until now, and I find for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, the Southern road received between Washington and Atlanta $883,451.60, exclusive of the subsidy, an increase over the regular pay when this special appropriation was first provided of $499,700.73. The mail had grown in volume until the regular pay had doubled and almost trebled what is was when the special appropriation was made, and yet we find in this post-office bill for the next fiscal year a provision for $142,728.25 for special mail facilities between Washington and New Orleans. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not go into a frenzy at the word "railroad" or "corporation." I realize that railroads and other corporations have played a conspicuous part in the progress and the industrial development of this country. I realize that in the years to come, as we go on growing and expanding, the railroads and the corporations will be important factors. I know of no more reason, because some corporations have misbehaved themselves and violated the laws of the land, that a man should make war upon all corporations than I do that because some men have violated the laws of God and man we should make war upon all humanity. Therefore what I shall say to-day is not out of a spirit of unfriendliness to the Southern Railroad or any other corporation, but it is in obedience to what I believe is my duty as a Representative after a full investigation of the facts. There are a good many gentlemen here from the South who have been the earnest supporters of this provision in the appropriation bill. I want to say to those gentlemen that whether they change their votes or not I want them henceforth to change the line of their argument. I am tired of hearing it repeated on the floor of this House that the country between here and New Orleans is too sparsely settled, that the volume of mail is too light, to justify the railway company in furnishing fast mail trains.

That, Mr. Chairman, is a slander upon the splendid section along the main line of the Southern Railroad. The territory between here and Atlanta has grown more rapidly and more marvelously than almost any other section of country in the last fifteen years. As was stated by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN], our cotton mills have increased from $65,000,000 to $225,000,000. The output of our mills has increased from $1,000,000,000 to $1,750,000,000. The mail transported between here and Atlanta has increased from 1893 to 1906 two and a half fold, and yet gentlemen from southern districts stand in the American House of Representatives and plead for this special appropriation upon the ground that our country is too sparsely settled and too poor to command these facilities. Probably these gentlemen have not looked into the facts. It involves an interminable amount of work, Mr. Chairman, but I took the trouble to go through the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General of the railway mail pay of every railroad in the United States. I have jotted down upon this paper every road and every section of road between the two great oceans where the railway pay amounts to more than $500 a mile.

I want to call the attention of New England Representatives to this remarkable fact: Sparsely settled New England, with slow ox-going trains, I presume, has not a railroad in all her borders that receives as many dollars per mile for transporting United States mail as the Southern Railroad receives from Washington to Danville, Va. There are only four roads in the New England States whose pay—that is, for the transportation of mail and rent of railway postal cars—exceeds $500 per mile per year!—only four roads in New England that earn over $500 a mile per year for transporting the mails! Here they are: From Portland to Bangor, 38 trips a week, $734.53 per mile; from Portland to Boston, 63 trips a week, $1,052.03 per mile; from Boston to Albany, N. Y., 92 trips a week, $1,693.89 per mile; Boston to New York City, 137 trips a week, $1,737.37 per mile.

Sparse New England! Why do you not come and ask for special mail facilities. Your people do not furnish mail enough on any road in all your borders to pay over $500 a mile, except the four lines which I have read; and the line from New York to Boston, which receives $1,737.37 a mile, makes 137 trips a week. I want now to call your attention to this poor and sparsely settled section between Washington and Danville, Va.—238 miles, 33 trips a week, $1,592.11 per mile. Thirty-three trips a week bring to that corporation $1,592.11 a mile, while the road from New York to Boston, with 137 trips a week, only gets $1,737.37 per mile per year.

Mr. ESCH. What is the mileage between New York and Boston, in order that we may get a more correct idea of your comparison? Will you give us the mileage? You gave it between Washington and Danville.

Mr. JOHNSON. The mileage from New York to Boston is 230 miles—$1,737.37 per mile for 137 trips per week.

Here is another poor railroad that it seems to me on account of sparse population and poor people might come to Congress asking for additional pay. From New York to Philadelphia—90 miles—the Pennsylvania road receives $5,319.54 per mile, and makes 294 trips a week, 42 trips a day. The friends of this road running through the sparse and poor country of Virginia delight to justify the railroads in furnishing its patrons fast mail trains.

The impression has been created in my district that if this appropriation were withheld by Congress, the special mail and express train, known as "97," would be taken off. Many people in that section believe that this special appropriation pays that particular train. They do not know that No. 97 gets the regular pay provided by law for carrying the mail as do other trains, and one-half of this special appropriation in addition. They seem to have the idea that it is paid for exclusively by this appropriation, and if this special appropriation were withdrawn we would lose the train. I want to call attention to the fact that this special appropriation began July 1, 1893, and this mail train, No. 97, between Washington and Atlanta was not put on that road until November 2, 1902. Our people appreciate a special mail train, but I want to call attention to the fact that exclusive mail trains are not a rarity in this country. There are many exclusive mail trains, and they run for the regular pay provided by law.

I call attention to the fact that the Iron Mountain and 'Frisco and Katy systems together are both running exclusive mail trains from St. Louis to Fort Worth, Tex., and neither one of these roads receives anything like as much per mile as the Southern receives between Washington and Atlanta.

How did this provision get in this bill? The Post-Office Department did not include it in the estimates. There is no evidence in the record in support of it or any request for it.

Now, my position is this: If the regular pay provided by law is inadequate to compensate the Southern Road for the service it performs, the burden of proving that fact is upon the railroad. If my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] desires to take himself out of the general rules of law that govern all other men, he must show special circumstances that would justify such exemption. So, then, if the regular pay provided by law is inadequate compensation for the service that railroad company is performing, the burden of proof is on it to show that fact, and when it does that it can get my vote, because I believe in paying individuals and corporations fair compensation for service rendered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. To interrupt my friend from South Carolina a moment, his reference to me a moment ago might be misleading in this—that it might leave the inference that I was a supporter of this special-train payment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I never thought so for a moment. I was simply using my friend to state a proposition of law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have always voted against it, and always will. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, the burden is not only upon that road to show that the regular pay provided by law is inadequate, but there is only one legitimate way to show it, and that is to appear before the proper committee of this Congress. What would you think of a judge who would base his decree, not upon sworn evidence found in the record, but upon a statement furnished by some unauthorized person in the lobby of a hotel? So there is but one way for this railroad to make this showing, and that is by going before the committees of this House and putting their testimony in the record, in order that every man may judge for himself as to its sufficiency.

I do not know whether the regular pay provided by the act of 1879 is excessive or not. I have good reasons for believing that it is ample. One of those reasons is negative and the other is positive. The positive reason is that the railroads all compete for the mails, and are anxious to get every pound of mail they can. The negative reason is that they have great influence in this country, and if the regular pay is inadequate they would make that fact known.

Now, Mr. Chairman, lacking time to read it, I want to print this table in the RECORD with my remarks, showing all the roads in the United States whose compensation exceeds $500 a mile for transporting the mails. I want you gentlemen from sparsely settled New England to examine this table. Only four roads in all your borders furnish mail enough to pay the railroads over $500 a mile. I want the Representatives from the magnificent Commonwealths of Indiana, Ohio, Wisconsin, and Illinois to see how few of the roads in their sparsely settled and poor communities furnish mail enough to amount to $500 a mile. Then I want you to run your eye down the line over the road that runs through the magnificent garden spot of this great continent—from Washington to New Orleans—and see how much mail our poor people furnish the railroad company. There is not a railroad in Mississippi that makes $500 a mile. The Illinois Central, from Memphis to New Orleans, comes under the $500 mark; yet all over this country they have splendid train facilities, they have splendid mail facilities, and the roads are competing for the work. Only two lines in the United States receive one cent in excess of the pay provided by law. These are Washington to New Orleans and Kansas City to Newton. The amount of subsidy from Washington to New Orleans is $142,758.25; Kansas City to Newton, $25,000. So, as I said before, if any of my southern friends continue to plead for this appropriation, I hope that henceforth they will not slander the South by representing that the quantity of mail furnished is inadequate to justify the same quick dispatch that other communities enjoy.

Just to give you an idea of how rapidly we grow—we are growing while all the other parts of the world sleep—I call your attention to the fact that at the last weighing period the natural increase between here and Danville was about $55,000. The figures that I am going to put in the RECORD are the figures that obtained on the 30th of June, 1905. On the 1st day of July, 1905, there was a readjustment from here to Danville, so that hereafter, instead of getting $301,000, they will receive $356,728.98 plus $77,000 car rentals, making $433,728.98. The natural increase in the volume of mail from here to Danville amounted to $55,000. And yet some of you friends here overlook the fact that we are growing marvelously and rapidly. I rejoice in the prosperity of that section. I rejoice in the prosperity of this same Southern road, which finds its business so heavy that it is now engaged in double-tracking from Washington to Atlanta. Does that look like there is not much business along its line? [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I had intended to direct attention to two other matters in the bill, but I see my time is out and I will take occasion under the five-minute rule to discuss them.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to call attention to the manner in which sentiment was created in my district in favor of this subsidy. It is published in a reputable paper, but I do not know who furnished the information. The paper certainly had no desire to deceive the public, and so I am laying no charge against the paper:

SOUTH A UNIT FOR SUBSIDY—STORM OF PROTEST AT THREATENED REMOVAL OF FAST MAIL.

When the matter of the special appropriation comes up in the House of Representatives shortly strong opposition will materialize among the eastern Republicans. The meat in the cocoanut seems to be the fact that it is not a desire to save the Government the $200,000 per year, but to divert this sum to the West for the same purpose.

Mr. BURLESON. Did I understand the gentleman to say that this was a reputable paper?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURLESON. Does the gentleman vouch for its truthfulness?

Mr. JOHNSON. I said the paper had no desire to deceive the public.

Mr. BURLESON. That statement is made under a misapprehension of the facts.

Mr. JOHNSON. Somebody has attempted to deceive my people by charging that you want to take this appropriation away from the South and give it to the West. I find no part of this bill that provides for subsidies except the two lines heretofore referred to and they do not need it. I hope the provision will be stricken from the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, some time ago I introduced in this House a bill (H. R. 13943) entitled—

A bill prohibiting the giving and receiving of free passes or transportation of person or property, or frank or franking privilege, or money, or other thing of value by any railroad, steamboat, express, telegraph, or telephone company to or by a Senator or Representative in Congress or any judge or justice of any United States court, and providing penalties therefor, and for other purposes.

The provisions of the bill are as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter it shall be unlawful for any railroad company, steamboat company, express company, or telegraph or telephone company to give to any Senator or Representative of the Congress of the United States, or to any judge or justice of any court of the United States any free pass or transportation of person or property, or frank, franking privilege, or money, or other thing of value; and any such company violating any of the provisions of this section shall be punished by fine of not less than $100 nor more than $5,000 for each such offense; and any officer or agent of such company or companies who shall violate any provision of this section shall be punished by fine not to exceed $5,000 or by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than six months nor more than two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 2. That if any Senator or Representative in the Congress of the United States or any judge or justice of any court of the United States shall receive from any railroad company, steamship company, or express company, telegraph or telephone company any free pass or transportation of person or property, or any frank or franking privilege, or gift of money, or other thing of value, he shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not to exceed $1,000 or by imprisonment not to exceed one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and shall forever be barred from holding office under the Government of the United States.

It was referred to the Judiciary Committee, which is presided over by its distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS]. The subcommittee to which it was referred reported it back, with some amendments, to the Judiciary Committee with a favorable recommendation.

My heart was glad, for it then seemed at last that the bill would be reported to the House, and that we would have an opportunity to enact this most important legislation and dispel the cloud of distrust and suspicion that hangs over and about us; but alas—

The best laid schemes o' mice and men
Gang aft a-gley.

We were doomed to disappointment. This promising child of honest reform—this young David, predestined to smite in the forehead the Goliath called "Graft" and behead the armed champion of corporation Philistines—was foully dealt with, and is now being strangled by the chairman, aided and abetted by a number of his Republican colleagues on the Judiciary Committee. And, strange to say, by some unknown and perhaps unknowable means, even the Republican members of the subcommittee, notwithstanding the indorsement contained in the favorable recommendation, are assisting in the assassination of their own offspring. Ascertaining that the committee, or rather the Republican end of it, was determined in its opposition, I went to the Speaker, stated the facts, and asked that he recognize me in order that I might get the matter before the House for its action. His reply was, "I can do dominates the committee; the Republican machine dictates legislation; the people's representatives are not even allowed to vote on this important measure. Why is this? The popular will all over the country calls for legislation on this subject. The Speaker of this House professes to be against the issuance of passes. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee openly admits that there ought to be legislation on the subject. Yet they have done nothing, and evidently do not intend to do anything.

Thus it stands. The Speaker is all powerful; the chairman nothing for you."

The bill is intended to strike at the root of a widespread and vicious custom. It does not regulate commerce, interstate or otherwise; nor does it attempt to regulate railroad corporations, nor companies engaged in the transmission, by wire, of public or private dispatches. The object sought is, and the effect of the measure will be, to divorce the legislative and judicial departments of our Government from the "blandishments," gifts, and privileges continually offered to them by those seeking special favors in the making of our laws and in the interpretation thereof by the courts. Also, if, as has been claimed, these corporations are forced by threats, or fear, to make gifts, or extend valuable favors and privileges, to the servants of the people, then, in that event, the bill is intended to give, and will give, relief from such outrage, and will abolish and strike down such nefarious practice.

It may be asked, What is the need for this legislation? It is not required by the Constitution. Our forefathers did not contemplate its necessity. This Government has existed more than a hundred years without it. Yes; that is all true. But it is also true that the framers of the Constitution recognized the principle contained in this bill, a principle that is fundamental and vital, one that is the essence of every code of religion, morals, or law, namely, absolute loyalty to one creed, one master. "No man can serve two masters." "Ye can not serve God and Mammon." You can not be faithful to the people and adhere to their oppressors.

Article I, section 9, of the Constitution provides:

No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States; and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them, shall without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foregin state.

Thus it will be seen that the builders of the Constitution fully understood the weakness of human nature and the danger to the country of "Greeks bearing gifts." The danger then was from without and not from within. The danger now is from within and not from without. [Applause.] The founders of this Government feared the influence of foreign interest and expressly guarded against it. Their action was wise and salutary. The railroad, telegraph, and other corporations, which now threaten every industry by their monopolistic combinations, were not then in existence. Had they been, those old patriots, who won our liberty by the sword and protected it by law, would have erected adequate barriers against corporate aggression. As it was, they made and handed down to us the framework of a splendid government, in which justice, freedom, equality were cardinal virtues and basic principles.

It became our duty by inheritance to follow up their work and to rightly solve the problems that necessarily confront us in the progress of our civilization.

In order to do this we must be like them—honest, vigilant, true to the people, consecrated to the task. We should not only strive to do right, but should also avoid the appearance of evil.

Mutual respect and confidence should unite the people and their public servants. How can the people respect you and confide in you when the great corporations are on such good terms with you that they give you as much or more in value as you receive from the Government?

Railroad passes are given to the Congress and the courts without limit; telegraph franks are unstintingly furnished to them; express companies are equally liberal; sleeping-car companies also keep pace with the procession. (These last were, by mistake, left out of my bill, but will be inserted by amendment.) Gentlemen say these are only courtesies extended to public officials. We all know better than to believe that. I do not think the proponents of that theory feel very comfortable in the conclusion. The official with his pockets full of franks and passes says, "It is only a courtesy;" then everybody laughs, and some sneer.

I tell you, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen, it does not lie in the mouth of a man whose pockets are filled with passes and franks to say that it is no slur upon his honor when the records of public meetings, political conventions, and legislatures of the States—when the writings of the best thinkers and the best moral teachers in the country, those who are acquainted with political science and political ethics—are brimful of charges of corruption, both in the intent of the parties who give these favors and as to the returns for these favors by many of those who receive them. That man who holds on to a part of the fruits of a robbery has no right to say that he is free from suspicion. Let every man clear his own skirts, and then he is in a position to judge of a subject that may concern him and his fellows. [Applause.] Therefore, I say, let the Congress of the United States silence the tongue of slander as to its Members innocent of such improprieties, and stop the wrongdoing of any who may be guilty by placing upon the statute books a law along these lines laid down by our forefathers.

A large majority, I fear, of our Senators and Members of the House, and the judges of the Federal courts, in the last ten or fifteen years, have accepted these favors; and have accepted them to the amount of great pecuniary value. When a man receives that which is equivalent to money, it is a very short step for him to get to the point when he is willing to receive the money itself. Suppose the system goes on and every Member is accorded so many passes and so many franks; that the number and amount of same should be governed by their value; suppose each one would get $500 worth allowed to him on application? How soon would it be when, instead of applying for the passes, they would simply make a commutation of the whole allowance and, as you do your stationery account, wind it up by taking out the whole amount in cash?

And that system could grow up and would be recognized and unblushingly practiced on the very same plan, by the very same means and gradations, that the present system of receiving favors and gifts from the corporations has been built up. I have made the statement that this was a matter wherein many men were guilty. I wish to read you the opinion of some men of high standing on this subject so that you, those of you who have not thought about the matter, who have been busy on other things, who are not perhaps fully awake to the seriousness of the situation, may know where we stand. Hon. Joseph H. Choate, a man honored by the nation, who was president of the constitutional convention in New York in 1894, after receiving a letter from the vice-president of the Pennsylvania Railroad in reference to abuses of this kind, said, in a public speech in that convention, among other things, this:

I confess that the letter that was written to be used here, by the vice-president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, opened my eyes to the magnitude of this evil, which has been so justly denounced by many of my fellow-delegates. I shall not add to their withering words in that respect.

Now listen:

I have made some inquiries since the receipt of that letter, and have reason to believe that a similar state of things exists in the State of New York as was depicted to me as existing in the State of Pennsylvania.

The letter referred to was read to the convention and placed on record as a public document. It is, in part, as follows:

[Document No. 42. Communication from T. J. Brooks, second vice-president of the Pennsylvania Railway, relative to passes.]

PENNSYLVANIA LINES WEST OF PITTSBURG,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND VICE-PRESIDENT,
Pittsburg, Pa., July 20, 1894.

Hon. JOSEPH H. CHOATE,
President Constitutional Convention, Albany, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: A few days ago I learned from an item in the newspaper that your convention is considering the question of prohibiting the issue of passes to public officials within the State of New York.

I desire to avail myself of the use of your honored name in presenting this letter to the committee to whose consideration that subject is committed.

* * * * * * *

I have seem the evils of the pass system grow from very small beginnings to what I regard as now very great and deplorable proportions. I have tried to persuade officials of other railroad companies to follow my example, and I have endeavored to persuade the legislature of Ohio, in which State I have always lived, on different occasions to pass prohibitory laws on this subject, but in each instance and always without avail.

There was a time when public officials were content to receive occasionally a trip pass for themselves. They have learned to ask for passes for themselves, for members of their families, and for political adherents and others. They not only ask for passes good over lines which are controlled by the officers to whom they apply, but they ask for passes over connecting lines to distant and remote parts of the country, good at all seasons of the year. They not only ask for trip passes for themselves and friends, but they ask for annual passes for themselves and friends; and no matter how many passes may be granted to a single individual, if a single request be refused the enmity of that official is aroused and his vengeance exercised if he has an opportunity so to do.

I have known a member of the Supreme Court of the United States to apply for free transportation the money value of which in a single instance was between $200 and $300. Governors of States, United States Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, members of every department of State government from the governor to the janitor, ask and expect to receive these favors.

* * * * * * *

I have seen other railroad companies issue these passes without stint to persons in all grades and stages of public life and receive a direct pecuniary benefit therefrom, and have seen those benefits withheld from our company because I did not do as other men did in the granting of passes.

An officer of a rival railroad company recently told me that he had taken the entire board of tax commissioners of a certain State, with their families and certain friends, from a large inland city to Fortress Monroe and Washington and back home, furnishing the comforts of a Pullman car, free transportation, and all expenses of the journey, and receiving, as he said, as a direct reward therefor a reduction on the appraisement of the property of the company he represented equivalent to many thousand dollars a year.

A pass over a railroad is the equivalent of money, and few men in civilized society are above the temptation of receiving it. In very many instances railroad companies receive a direct pecuniary equivalent of the pass which they give. In other cases the public officials who receive passes quietly enjoy the saving of money which the passes afford them and discharge their duties impartially as between the railroad company and the public precisely as if the passes had not been given.

I regard the tendency of the system pernicious in the extreme. The difference between the giving a thing of money value and money itself to a public official is slight. If railroad officials and public officials become accustomed to the giving and receiving of things of value, the official character of the recipient being the only consideration thereof, the conscience of both railroad officials and public officials becomes demoralized and corrupted, and men on both sides soon learn that money might as well be given as passes for the purpose of controlling the action of public servants.

I have always thought that the practice of railroad companies in giving these passes to servants of the public was, and is, one important factor of the distrust and denunciation in which the common people indulge against railway corporations. It certainly needs no argument to prove that free transportation is a thing of money value, and that these passes, given to men in public life, who, in the exercise of their public functions, are required to pass upon the rights of railroad companies, as between railroad companies and the public, are given for a consideration, and, no matter what the forms or terms of courtesy on which those passes are given, the selfish and improper motive is always apparent.

* * * * * * *

Within the last few years blackmailing legislators have been introducing bills for the taxation of sleeping-car companies, express companies, and telegraph companies. The result is that passes are being issued by these various organizations in greater or less number, and telegraph passes can now be found in the pockets of nearly all members of the legislature in all the important States.

I hope the constitutional convention of the great State of New York will set a noble example on this subject. If they can be made to realize the evils and the evil tendencies of the free-pass system as it now exists I am certain they will do so.

Yours, respectfully,

J. T. BROOKS,
Second Vice-President.

What do you now think of this matter? Are the bounties so lavishly given to the Congress and the courts mere courtesies? The testimony in that letter and in the statement of Mr. Choate are enough to bring a blush of shame to the cheek of any self-respecting man. Look at the picture! Legislators, judges, our Supreme Court! Away with such a system. How dare any man stand in the way of this reform? Why can the servants of the public not keep their hands out of the flesh pots of corporate corruption? They get their salary, mileage, and pay for all needed expense, and many of them then turn to the trusts they have denounced in their districts during the campaign and ask for and receive gifts of great value.

If such practices began in innocence, they have long since outlived that condition. They have grown as class legislation has grown. They increased as the trusts have increased. They have become sullenly defiant as the monopolies have become defiant. As these gratuitous emoluments and moneyed favors have broadened and swelled in volume and value, so have the law-making and judicial officers of the Government drifted away from old landmarks and deserted from their service to the country. Passes, franks, and other favors have been effectively used as powerful persuaders; and, Mr. Chairman, a system of persuasion so strong that it will override the constitutional obligation of the elected trusted servants of the people is certainly very powerful and dangerous.

I wish now to speak, not in the spirit of criticism, nor from the standpoint of being "more righteous than thou." I do not wish to say anything against our sister States. But take the State of Pennsylvania, for instance. They have a constitutional provision in that State against the issuance of free passes to public servants.

Mr. KLINE. No.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says "No." I will read from the records of the constitutional convention of the State of New York, from the speech of a distinguished member, Mr. Nicoll. The proposition was to prescribe penalties in the constitutional provision prohibiting free passes to officials of the State. Some advocated a provision denouncing free passes, but leaving the penalty to the legislature. Mr. Nicoll contended that it was advisable to direct by the constitution that such offenders should be punishable by fine and imprisonment, and also be forever barred from holding office. That was his contention, and in support of that he says:

> There is no reason why the State of New York should repeat the experience of the State of Pennsylvania, where they have a similar provision, and where every public officer rides on passes, notwithstanding.

Mr. KLINE. No; they do not.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. The reason they do not is because the railroads have recently taken away their passes. Their power in Pennsylvania is so great they have grown independent, and now show the contempt they have long felt for the politicians and public officials of Pennsylvania. I take Pennsylvania as only an instance. I was showing the strength of this system in that practically solid Republican State. The Constitution says that public officers shall not ride on passes, and, merely because there is no law making a penalty, it has been overridden by the people who hold the offices in that State, and would continue to be overridden were it not that the railroads, drunk with power and nauseated with disgust, have kicked them out and taken away their much-loved passes! What an object lesson for patriots to study!

As I am speaking on the power of this system, let us take the Democratic State of Texas. Here we find another object lesson. The last four Democratic platforms of that State have declared for an antifree-pass law. The last four legislatures were elected solidly Democratic, and yet the law has not been passed by any one of them, because their pockets are full of passes and their hearts full of desire for privilege. What other reason can be assigned? It is not altogether a question of whether you are a Democrat or a Republican. It is the system based on a power that appeals to the selfishness and greed of man that I am fighting. It is a system that has grown up so broad, so great, and so shameless that it is a national disgrace. What effect does it have? It debauches the public service and poisons the fountains of justice.

If any corporation asking special legislation should give money to any Member and it was known, that would be considered a disgrace, and would suggest crime. We have a law against bribery. The law against bribery denounces the doing or not doing some specific official act for pay. But is not a gift with intent to influence the Congress or the court a bribe in conscience? You may employ a lawyer by the case or by the year. You may bribe an officer as to one thing or as to everything. Bribery is specific. Gifts are general—the same in principle. A man that receives $500 in money from the Pennsylvania Railroad, for instance, would be looked upon as a bribe taker, but the man who receives $5,000 worth of privileges that are equal, exactly equal, to money itself, is considered a respectable gentleman; and by himself, perhaps, it is considered that he does not violate any of the amenities or any of the proprieties of his official position.

The time has come in the history of this country when, not foreign powers, but people who are part of our own Government, those corporations, those monopolies, those institutions that have been built up on special privilege and wish to run this country (and many say they are running it), are sustaining this system. There is no question about the fact. These people pay your way to your homes, and from your home to your convention, and pay the way of your friends and supporters to the conventions. The men who will vote for measures for the railroads and the other corporations that they want to favor can get passes, franks, etc., without limit. The companies give to all who will receive, and they get a return for it. Do they not? Our laws and decisions fully answer the question.

When some of the Members of this House who were riding upon passes voted for the Esch-Townsend bill in the Fifty-eighth Congress their passes on the January following were refused them because they voted against the will of the railroads. This is true, according to the statement that was openly and notoriously published all over the United States, and never, so far as I know, has been denied. I believe it to be a fact, because there has not been a denial. That shows not only, I think, to every man in this House, but to everyone in this country that the railroads are seeking to influence and control your action as servants of the people by the system of valuable gifts. The giving and receiving of such gifts ought to be denounced by law, the offenders put in the penitentiary and prohibited from holding public office.

Any man who will receive a favor, knowing that the intention is to corrupt him (no matter how incorruptible he may think himself), ought not to occupy a position of honor or trust, representing the people in a popular government. [Applause.] We should put the stamp of disapproval on this system and blot it out by law.

I appeal to every patriotic Member (and I hope that includes nearly all in this House) to work as a unit to force the passage of this bill. Why should the Speaker, by his power; why should the Republican machine in this body; why should the chairman of this committee and some of the Republican members of it, control our action? Why should they refuse to let this salutary measure be voted on, which is in the interest of the people and for the honor of the Congress and the courts.

In this connection I will cite the testimony of some other prominent men. The following are extracts from a recent publication by Col. R. E. Cowart, of Dallas, Tex.:

> It is all wrong. It is simply infamous. * * * These free passes are granted by the railroads for important business, political, and commercial reasons. It is the most powerful weapon they have. A friend of mine recently related to me a conversation he heard in 1886 between Governor Throckmorton, of Texas; Governor Brown, of Tennessee, and the late Col. George Noble, who was then general superintendent of the Texas and Pacific Railroad. They were discussing the civil war, when Governor Brown remarked that our civil war was unavoidable, and could not have been prevented any more than could the French revolution. Colonel Noble begged leave to differ, and said that if a great popular upheaval like the French revolution were to break out now, and the Government would give him control of all the railroads in the nation and allow him to issue all the free passes he desired, he would guarantee under heavy bond to suppress the revolution in three weeks.

> There is a climate of opinion and morality. A hundred years ago lotteries were used by the churches to raise money for different purposes. In fact, morality is largely relative. In England the King, all the royal family, lords and commons, nobility, gentry, and middle classes, everybody in every official rank and condition in society, pays his or her way on the railroads. Such a thing as a free pass is unknown. A judge in England who would accept a free pass from a railroad and then try a case in which that railroad was interested, would be driven in disgrace from the bench. There is no such acute sense of judicial propriety here and among us. In Washington last winter it was jokingly told that when one of our United States supreme judges was tendered an annual pass by one of the railroads he became very much offended and said, indignantly, that he would not receive it in the form it was issued to him. The railroad official who had brought the pass, anxious to please him, asked him in what form he would take it. The learned judge replied that it ought to be amended and that they should insert in it that the pass was for him and his family. "Do that and I will accept it." It was done.

Hon. B. Q. Evans, in a newspaper article, last December, among other things on this subject, said:

With the fight that has been going on in this State between the people and the railway companies over the proposition that a law should be passed prohibiting railway companies from giving passes to public officials, and with the victories won by the railway companies by the means of the free pass and the lobby over the people, each victory only emphasizes the necessity for the law. And with this contest going on it is no more an open question in Texas as to what the purpose is that a railway company has in giving a pass to public officials. It used to be thought that it was given as a mere matter of courtesy to the officials, and all men tried to reason with themselves that this was the purpose and have justified themselves in accepting them; but the only purpose that a railway company has in giving a pass to an official is for the purpose of influencing his official conduct. Will any man deny this?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Was there not a vote on your bill in the committee? And if so, what was the vote; and who voted for it, and who against it?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. No Democrat voted against it. Some Republicans voted for it. Not knowing exactly how far it is proper for me to state what occurred in the committee, I will not undertake to do so.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It has been published in the papers that the committee stood 6 and 6.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I heard that on the outside and I guess that is true.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The Democrats present all voted for it, and two Republicans?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I heard that on the outside, and am sure it is true. This committee is hung up and can not act. The chairman of the committee and the Speaker of the House will not permit us to untie the knot that binds the committee. They are tied up.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to propound another interrogatory?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You have spoken about the railroads giving passes voluntarily. Is it not a fact that sometimes the railroads feel as though they were practically held up and had to give the passes to buy their peace?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. There are honest men, no doubt, in the railroad business——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Who scorn the very idea even of being the instruments of corruption in giving out these passes. They would like to see legislation stopping this infamy.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Exactly.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. But I do believe, in all candor, that the great majority of the political agents of the corporations of the country do not want to see any such legislation. They have too much power as the result of it to willingly give it up. They get out of it, no doubt, many millions of dollars every year, and the men who receive these favors only get proportionately a very small part of the swag in this robbery.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. One more question and then I am done. Is it not also a fact, adjudged in the case, I think, of the Boston and Maine road, a case that was pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission, that a newspaper had passes; and when it criticised that railroad company the company immediately demanded the return of the passes? Does not that appear in the record in that case?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I understand that to be the fact, and that is only one of numerous cases of that sort.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. So the press is rather muzzled by these passes, too.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I think there is great need for immediate action. Our national and State legislatures, courts, and executive departments; our lines of transportation and facilities for public news; our revenues and disbursements; our political parties and party conventions; the election of our public officials; yea, even the supply of the necessaries of life are the things sought to be controlled by this modern system of incorporated wealth. Look to your homes! Can manhood longer hesitate?

Pass this bill, and all needed legislation along this line will be assured. The fountain source of law will be disinfected and purified; the noisome vapors and poisonous fog that now envelop us will pass away; the legislative and judicial atmosphere will be cleared; the unobstructed sunlight of conscience will illumine the path of duty, and the Congress, rehabilitated with a correct and lofty comprehension of the proprieties to be observed by the servants of the people, will justly consider and properly enact effective laws on this subject for the government of all public officials. Nay, more; by the exercise of the power of Congress—the performance of its duty to the people—to regulate interstate commerce we will, in conjunction with the States within their jurisdiction, secure for all the people equal rates for passenger fare in the whole country. The ordinary rates are, for common people, 3 cents per mile. The average rate is about 2 cents per mile. If the rate was fixed at 2 cents per mile, and everybody was compelled to pay alike, the immense increase in travel resulting from the decreased rate would be of great benefit to the public and would also produce a greater revenue to the railway companies. The right way is the best way, and the best way is to compel every man to pay for what he gets. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is in charge of the time on that side. To whom does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield one more minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RANDELL].

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in the few seconds allotted to me, I wish to reiterate: Let every man pay for what he gets. Any other system is unjust, dishonest, impolitic, and must ultimately result in public calamity. Let us call a halt on this practice that builds up a favored class at the expense of the industrious masses. Let us cease to dishonor our institutions by the methods of favoritism and graft, and return actually and practically to that fundamental principle of popular government, "Equal rights to all, special privileges to none."

I appeal to the patriotic element in Congress to unite in the effort to pass this bill. Why should the Speaker and the Republican machine and the Judiciary Committee enslave us and trample on the rights of the people? They shall not prevent this legislation! It is coming, and that soon. The minions of graft, greed, and political trickery have had their day. Retribution is at hand. The people are becoming aroused; and woe to the man, or set of men, who stand in the way of their wrath. The patriots in every Congressional district should see to it that no man, whether he be Democrat or Republican, is returned to this House who has the disposition to fill his pockets with gifts from the coffers of the trusts. Yea, they should scorn to send here a representative who is so lost to honesty, propriety, and decency that he will stoop to receive anything by reason of his official position from anyone, save from the people whose servant he is.

Some of those in absolute power here now may be so well intrenched in their district by the influence of the corporations and the money they corruptly contribute that it will be impossible to defeat them. God pity such districts. They disgrace American citizenship. But, rest assured, the great mass of American manhood will rise in its might and hurl from power the betrayers of their country. Let honest and capable men be sent to Congress—real old-fashioned patriots—whose prime purpose is to serve the Republic; and they will faithfully and efficiently solve all the problems of legislation. God speed the day when our laws shall be made in purity and justice, interpreted in wisdom, and executed in honor. [Continued applause.]

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I request that the RECORD be extended and the documents to which I have referred be printed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

[Mr. BARTLETT addressed the committee. See Appendix.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CURTIS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5498. An act granting additional lands from the Fort Douglas Military Reservation to the University of Utah;

S. 4256. An act for the relief of the Alaska Short Line Railway and Navigation Company's railroad;

S. 3245. An act creating the Mesa Verde National Park; and

S. 1344. An act for the relief of John M. Burks.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution (S. C. Res. 15) providing for the printing of certain papers and documents of the Navy Department, relating to the efficiency of various coals used by United States vessels for steaming purposes, etc.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 4461. An act to provide for the abatement of nuisances in the District of Columbia by the Commissioners of said District, and for other purposes;

H. R. 15328. An act to approve certain final proofs in the Chamberlain land district, South Dakota; and

H. R. 8717. An act for the relief of Jacob Pickens.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

House concurrent resolution No. 26.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 5,000 copies of the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, Fifty-ninth Congress, at the United States Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., on the subject of hazing at the Naval Academy, with accompanying report, 3,500 copies for the House of Representatives and 1,500 for the Senate.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL].

[Mr. MORRELL addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield an hour, or so much thereof as he may use, to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia who has just taken his seat has given an interesting illustration of what some people please to call the autocratic power exercised by the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, relating to the admission to the mails as second class of certain periodicals. He has shown that that official is certainly impartial upon the tariff in that he has admitted the American Economist and a free-trade journal, one advocating extreme protection and the other free trade; but he has also shown that this official is coldly impervious to the rural sentiments and the refined religious instructions contained in the Union News, published in Georgia. I doubt not this power is exercised arbitrarily in many instances.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to make some comments upon the bill before the House—the post-office appropriation bill. This is the first session in which I have had the honor to serve as a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. It gives me great pleasure to state that that committee has given of intelligence and zeal and loyalty and industry to the consideration of that important bill all that the subject deserves, and they have omitted no source of information which would enable them to reach a just and wise conclusion in formulating the items which go into this great appropriation bill.

This bill carries the aggregate sum of more than $191,000,000, distributed through the departments of the Postmaster-General and the several (four) Assistant Postmasters-General. Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt to discuss every feature of this bill; but I desire to make, first, a few comments upon the item for railway mail pay, an item comprising less than two lines, yet carrying an aggregate appropriation of $43,000,000.

There has been much discussion in the press regarding this subject, much of misinformation and of wrongful comment, while some journals have exhibited careful study and intelligent conclusion.

The original statute upon which the railway mail pay is based was passed in 1873, and except two amendments we have the same statute in force to-day. Between 1873 and 1878 there was, first, a horizontal reduction of 10 per cent, and then another horizontal reduction of 5 per cent, and with these two exceptions our railway mail pay is graduated upon the same statute to-day.

Some years ago a postal commission was appointed by Congress, which made its report in 1900, and while there were some differences among the members of that commission, yet they all substantially agreed in the conclusion that the pay for transportation of mail by rail was not grossly excessive. In my opinion, having attempted to give some study to the question—and it is a most intricate one—and as the ranking minority member of the committee, Mr. MOON, well said, there appears to be no adequate information in the reports of the Post-Office Department which would enable one to reach a satisfactory conclusion on the subject—I say that, in my opinion, it does seem to me that while upon the short roads—the roads carrying a slight amount of mail matter—the compensation is not too great, yet upon those railways intersecting the centers of congested population, with large traffic, connecting large cities and carrying a large quantity of mail matter, that the amount of pay graduated under this statute is excessive and ought to be reduced in the interest of economical administration. This is as far as I would like to go at this time upon this question of railway mail pay and as far as my information and study will justify me.

Mr. Chairman, we hear much about the deficit in the administration of the Postal Department and particularly in its relation to second-class mail matter.

I could give what are said to be some interesting figures relating to second-class mail matter. For the fiscal year 1905 the deficit in round numbers was fourteen and one-half million dollars. While a modern and constantly improved and expeditious service is of the first consideration, yet it is advisable when practicable to wipe out or reduce as far as possible this postal deficit. Unquestionably the greatest item in this deficit arises from carrying the second-class mail matter, consisting of daily newspapers and other periodicals, which are carried at the rate of 1 cent a pound. The best information obtainable—that is, for 1904—shows that of the total weight of mail carried, 67 per cent consisted of second-class matter, which yielded less than 4 per cent of the total revenue of the Department. During that year the mails carried amounted to 912,000,000 pounds in the aggregate, not including Government matter, at a cost of 16⅔ cents per pound. The deficit for that year was about $9,000,000. Of the total amount of mail matter, 610,000,000 pounds was second class, and that cost in round numbers $101,000,000, while the revenue from it was less than $6,000,000, making a net loss on second-class mail matter of $95,000,000.

On the other hand, the revenue during the same year from first-class mail matter—letters—was $107,000,000, while the cost of carrying first-class matter was $18,000,000, making a net profit on first-class matter of $89,000,000.

In other words, first-class matter constituted 12 per cent of the total weight carried and produced 78 per cent of the total revenue. This large weight of second-class matter has a direct relation to the railway mail pay. The large quantity of mail forwarded by the Government under the penalty privilege, consisting not only of departmental mail and documents, but departmental equipment, adds largely to the weight of mails carried by rail. In addition to that the franking privilege adds another large burden to the weight of the mails. Railroads are paid not for space, but for weight, and under the statute the amount is calculated on the basis of tonnage per mile. It is therefore self-demonstrative that if the weight of mail carried by the railroads could be reduced, the amount to be paid to railroads would necessarily decrease, and the deficit would be minimized.

The chairman of this committee, in making the opening remarks when this bill was presented, called attention to certain provisions by which it is hoped that the aggregate amount of bulky mail carried shall be reduced in the future, and thereby means may be found of reducing the railway mail pay. He referred to the provision that between the 1st day of July, 1906, and the 31st day of December a record is to be kept of all second-class mail carried free and all second-class mail admitted under the cent per pound rate, and all matter carried under penalty privilege, and all under the franking privilege; that before the next quadrennial weighing in the four great subdivisions of the country there would be withdrawn from the mails all matter now being forwarded by the Department, and it would be carried by freight, so that during the weighing period the weight carried should be reduced by that extent. He referred to that section by which it is proposed to prohibit the Department, under the penalty privilege, from sending any package in the mails weighing substantially more than 4 pounds, limiting them in the use of the mails in the forwarding of equipment to the use which is permitted to ordinary citizens in delivering to the mails packages weighing 4 pounds or less. I believe that if the House shall find it its pleasure to adopt these several provisions in this bill that it will result in a great saving of weight, and therefore in a decided saving to the Government in the payment for railway mail transportation.

I wish to make some brief comments, Mr. Chairman, upon the question of rural free-delivery service.

This is one of the latest improvements in our postal service and has accomplished a result so educational and beneficent as to have enlisted the approval of the country and the gratitude of the rural sections. This service has come to stay, and should receive the continued support of Congress and the cordial encouragement of the Department. This service has had a phenomenal growth. It may be said to have had its beginning on October 1, 1896, less than ten years ago; but its growth was very slow in the early years. For instance, in 1898 there were only 148 routes in operation and in 1899 only 391 routes. In 1903 the number of routes had increased to 15,119. In 1905 the number was 32,055, while on March 1, 1906, the number of routes in existence was 35,031. There are evidences accumulating that the present Postmaster-General and his Fourth

Assistant are applying conditions which not only make it more difficult and tend to minimize the number of new routes established, but also to discontinue or give a triweekly service to many routes now in existence. I regard this disposition of the Department as unwarranted and without the sanction of Congress and contrary to public sentiment. I am in hearty sympathy with the opinion expressed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], who has had long experience on this committee, that entirely too much discretion is vested in the Department. The function of this Executive Department is to administer the law and to carry out the will of Congress. Not a single existing route should be discontinued. If any route is poorly patronized, then an investigation should be made with a view to changing the route or of adding to it, and thereby increasing the amount of mail matter handled; but under no conditions should the patrons of any route who have come into the enjoyment and appreciation of this service have its benefits ruthlessly taken from them by the action of the Department. My district has already felt the force of this new policy, and in the past several weeks notice has been received of the discontinuance of one route and on another route that the service had been changed from daily to triweekly. As illustrating that this committee entertained a generous attitude toward this service, it may be stated that the appropriation contained in the bill is slightly in excess of $3,000,000 more than the appropriation for the current fiscal year.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Before the gentleman leaves that I want to ask if he does not agree with this suggestion: That the more sparsely settled the country and the fewer the people who live in a given section where these mail routes go is a better reason for their continuance?

Mr. SMALL. In answer to the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, I would say that within reason, depending upon the distance they are from any existing post-office, I do believe the gentleman is right; that we should not consider the expense, but that it is the right of every citizen to demand that the service of the Post-Office Department should be extended to him.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, if the gentleman from North Carolina will pardon another suggestion. If he has read a recent article of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General he will find he says in traveling through New England recently he discovered that the routes dissipated melancholy, lessened suicide, and that the per cent of lunatics going to the asylum had been decreased wherever in these sparsely settled sections of the country these mail routes went; that they had been lessened from 5 to 12 per cent.

Mr. SMALL. I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, of the truth which the gentleman illustrates. I have no doubt that among the beneficent results of the rural free-delivery service to those engaged in agriculture is that fact that it brightens home life, and that it does tend and must tend to prevent the repetition of those physical and mental troubles which accompany loneliness, so often the bane of rural life.

I wish to call attention to another contemplated change in this service. Since the rural free-delivery service was established, investigations connected with same have been conducted by what are now known as "rural agents," under the jurisdiction of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, and immediately under the control of the general superintendent of the rural free-delivery service. On December 1, 1905, by order of the Postmaster-General, the rural agents and the division superintendents were taken from the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General and placed under the immediate supervision of the chief post-office inspector, Mr. Vickery. I have always thought that investigations of rural free-delivery service should be made by a distinct class of agents, and not by post-office inspectors, who have numerous other duties. The rural agent requires special fitness. He comes in contact with the good people who live on the farms, and it is important that he should make a favorable impression. He should not only be loyal to his duty, but he should be pleasant and agreeable in discharging it, and besides he should be willing to undergo discomfort if his duty so required.

The post-office inspectors, as a rule, visit mostly the towns and very seldom get away from the railroads. They are unfitted to make successful investigations of rural service. Now, this bill proposes, under the provision for post-office inspectors, to abolish the positions of rural agent and make the present 143 rural agents and 7 division superintendents post-office inspectors. The plea made by the Department, who recommend this change, is that the inspectors may even now be detailed to investigate the rural service and that the duties of the rural agents will be enlarged. I regard the change as distinctly injurious to the rural free-delivery service, and I shall offer an amendment to the bill to strike out this provision and retain the office of rural agents as a distinct and separate force in that service. I warn Members who wish to extend the rural service that they must meet this undercurrent of opposition to the end that Congress shall assert its prerogative and that gradually the rural service may be extended throughout the country.

I wish to discuss, Mr. Chairman, another item in this bill. It is a provision substantially similar in terms to that which has been contained in the post-office appropriation bill for more than ten years, except that the amount has been from time to time reduced. The two paragraphs are as follows:

For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Washington to Atlanta and New Orleans, $142,728.70: Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

For continuing necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Kansas City, Mo., to Newton, Kans., $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

During the six years I have served in this House I have voted for this provision for reasons which seemed satisfactory to me and which were in accord with my sense of public duty. This is the first session I have had the honor to serve as a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and I felt that it was incumbent upon me to give this matter even more careful consideration; and I was prepared, if need be, to vote differently at this session, if further investigation had led me to a different conclusion. My own constituency derives no immediate benefit from this expedition of the mail. The eastern section of North Carolina where I reside is, perhaps, 200 miles from the main line of the Southern Railway, and the mail for my section is brought by another trunk line. I am therefore fitted to have given unbiased consideration to the subject, both in a representative and individual capacity.

While heretofore voting for this measure, I have been content to listen to the discussions, which, however, have not always been instructive, and to abide by my own judgment, and have not heretofore entered into any public discussion of the question. There is a division of opinion in my State as to the advisability and the necessity of these appropriations. So far as I am advised, most of the newspapers in the territory served by this mail route favor the same, as do the industrial and commercial centers through which it passes. One newspaper, the News and Observer, published at my State capital, having a large circulation and exercising a great influence, and with whose editor I have had a life-long acquaintance and friendship, vigorously and insistently opposes these appropriations as being unnecessary and undemocratic. One of my distinguished colleagues, with whom I claim friendship and for whom I have great respect, through whose district this great trunk line passes—Hon. W. W. KITCHIN—several days ago spoke for more than an hour in opposition; spoke with great vigor, and, I regret to say, appeared to exhibit some feeling upon the subject. The distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, the ranking minority member of the Post-Office Committee, Hon. JOHN A. MOON, delivered his annual anathema against these appropriations. The House had come to look upon the philippics of this gentleman upon this subject as one of the perennial entertainments during the consideration of this bill. I am not yet ready to submit to party excommunication, even at the hands of such distinguished partisans, and I shall be so ungracious as to refuse to admit that these and the few other gentlemen who are annual opponents and entertainers upon this question are the only specimens of robust integrity in this House. By reason of all these circumstances it occurred to me as necessary to abandon my modesty and give some reasons for the necessity of and benefit from this service and to maintain the integrity of that part of the membership of this House which has heretofore supported these items.

You would never realize that there was any item for special facilities under consideration except from Washington to New Orleans. The provision for special facilities from Kansas City to Newton, Kans., appears to have been eliminated from the discussion. Although there are three distinct lines of railroads between Washington and New Orleans, between whom the appropriation is equitably divided, one hears mentioned the name of the Southern Railway only. There appears to be some magic and infectious quality about this name which causes the hair of some gentlemen to rise and to arouse their anger.

The two items are in many respects similar in purpose and necessity, but I shall follow the illustrious example which has been set me and refer more particularly to the mail service between Washington and New Orleans.

This is not a new proposition, either in its specific application or as an illustration of the consistent efforts of Congress and the Department to improve the mail service. The primary consideration in the transportation of mails is quick and efficient service, while the net profit from the operation has always been, and should continue to be, a secondary consideration. From the time when the mails were carried on horseback along bridle paths, over bad roads, and across unbridged creeks, the Post-Office Department, with the approval and encouragement of Congress, has from time to time utilized improved and quicker methods of conveyance, and for inland distribution the railroad furnishes to-day the most expeditious movement. Obviously there never has been and never will be any arbitrary rule by which compensation for transporting mails by any known method and schedule can be fixed and determined in advance as applicable to any given service. It has always been the custom and is the rule to-day that if the Department wishes the mails carried by an unusually quick schedule a special contract and special compensation must be made therefor. It frequently happens by reason of existing conditions that the schedules offered are sufficiently attractive without extra compensation. Some of the factors which enter into this result are density of population, heavy passenger and express traffic, and, perhaps more than all, competitive conditions. There was a time when extra compensations for unusually fast schedules were paid to many railway lines in the country, but the development of the above and other conditions and the refusal of railway companies to permit the Department to control the schedules have gradually eliminated all except the two provided for in the bill. So that it is not an unusual condition which confronts us.

There were no appropriations for special railway facilities in the South until about 1880, when Congress made an appropriation, and the Department contracted for an improved schedule from Boston, via New York and Washington, and thence, via the Atlantic Coast Line and the Plant System, to Jacksonville and Tampa, and later by steamer to Habana. The extra amounts then paid were very much larger than those contained in this bill. The appropriation for these special facilities, via these lines, continued until June 30, 1893. Neither Congress nor the Department discontinued the same. It was brought about directly by the refusal of the Atlantic Coast Line longer to permit the Post-Office Department to control its schedules for trains, this road giving notice some months in advance of its intention to abandon its contract. In the meantime a demand arose, particularly from the section between Atlanta and New Orleans, for an improvement upon the existing unsatisfactory schedule for the transportation of mail from the North. This resulted in an appropriation by Congress, under which a contract was made for special train facilities between New York and New Orleans, via the Pennsylvania Railroad to Washington and the then Richmond and Danville system from Washington to Atlanta, and connecting lines to New Orleans. This arrangement continued until June 30, 1902, prior to which time the Pennsylvania Railroad voluntarily declined to renew its contract and to permit the Department to control its schedule. Since that time the item in each appropriation bill has been the same as in the bill under consideration.

The question arises, Ought this House to continue the appropriation for these special facilities, or ought it to discontinue it? I propose to consider briefly a few facts in connection with the merits of the case.

The retention of the existing mail schedule, as embodied in the contract between the Department and the railroads, made possible by this appropriation, is a benefit to all the section lying between Washington and New Orleans, including the sections traversed by the many lateral diverging lines. I assume no man of intelligence and fairness will deny this proposition. My colleague from North Carolina admitted this. Every Representative whose district is affected will acknowledge the benefit. I also assume that no Member of this House, regardless of section, would willfully impair this splendid mail service. Therefore this brings us directly to the question, Is this appropriation necessary for the maintenance of the existing mail schedule? Let us pursue this query.

It is well known that the Post-Office Department, under the law and the regulations, does not, in forwarding mail by railroads, attempt to fix or regulate the schedules of trains. Every Member who is informed on the subject, and particularly those gentlemen who claim to have given exhaustive study to the question, should know this. And yet no one has had the candor to admit the fact. It is said that the law requires the railroads to carry the mail with "reasonable expedition and dispatch," but these general terms will cover any schedule within reason which the railroad thinks it is prudent or safe or profitable to arrange for its trains. In other words, it is the universal custom that the railroads prepare the schedules and put on the trains and notify the Department, and then the Department decides whether or not it will send mail by that particular train. If this appropriation should be defeated, the Department would be practically without power to compel the railroad companies between Washington and New Orleans to adopt any particular schedule, but it would forward the mail by such train and by such schedules as these railroads under all the conditions choose to adopt.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I also undertook to show that this train No. 97 was a necessity and the result of increased traffic, and that it was greatly profitable without this special appropriation; that the line was profitable, and that the system was profitable. Now, does the gentleman think that it has ever been the theory of the Government to aid any enterprise except one which was unprofitable in itself?

Mr. SMALL. I understand what the gentleman is after.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Now, if this train is necessary, is running upon a natural schedule, the growth of a natural development, and is profitable, how can the gentleman argue that this special appropriation is necessary for its continuance?

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman is simply repeating the best part of his speech made the other day. I think I can satisfactorily answer the same. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to answer one part of the question asked by my colleague from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]. I challenge the gentleman to find in the hearings where the Second Assistant Postmaster-General in the hearings before the committee made any such statement as the gentleman alleges was made by him.

Mr. WEBB. Now, in reply to that challenge I think I ought to be heard.

Mr. SMALL. I would be glad if the gentleman would refer to it in the book of hearings.

Mr. WEBB. I didn't say that I got it from the hearings. I asked the gentleman if he was not aware that the Postmaster-General had said what I said. I have the letter here in which he used the language which I quoted to the gentleman, and if the gentleman will allow me, I will read the paragraph. It is very brief.

Mr. SMALL. I decline to yield for that purpose. The gentleman said the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. WEBB. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon, I said the Postmaster-General.

Mr. SMALL. We did not have the Postmaster-General at any hearing before our committee.

Mr. WEBB. This letter——

Mr. SMALL. I decline to yield, Mr. Chairman. We had before the committee the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who has charge of the schedules of the railway-mail trains. I knew he had not given expression to any such statement as the gentleman attributed to him.

Mr. WEBB. This letter that I have is countersigned by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Shallenberger.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman can get time, and if he wants to quote anything from the Postmaster-General in opposition to the extension of these mail facilities to the South, he is at liberty to do so in his own time, but I can not yield to him now.

Gentlemen in this discussion have said that the withdrawal of this appropriation would make no difference, and that the Southern Railway and its connecting lines would maintain the same schedule. I believe they modestly admit that they are not in the confidence of the traffic managers and that they speak without authority and merely by inference. Is it fair to infer that the Southern Railway would continue its train No. 97, consisting of four mail cars and one express car from Washington to Atlanta, and with the same schedule, if it could get the same compensation without doing so, particularly when it runs, in addition, two other through trains from Washington to New Orleans each day? I have no means of knowing the intentions of railroad companies, although some gentlemen may be informed, but I take it to be a fair inference that the railroads will not voluntarily enter into an agreement with the Department and permit the Department to fix its schedules, and will not voluntarily continue to run a mail and express train from Washington to Atlanta—at least, not on a schedule of 41 miles per hour, including all stops. At any rate, I am not willing, as a Representative and member of this committee, whose duty it is to see that the mails are carried to every part of this great country with the utmost expedition—I am not willing to take the chances of depriving that splendid section of the South from the enjoyment of its existing mail facilities.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. If the gentleman has any information of that kind, I would like to know what it is; if he has any direct expression from them.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SMALL. I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HAY. Upon that point I wrote to the vice-president of the Southern Railway Company to know whether the train would be kept on and the schedule maintained if this subsidy were taken away. I have his reply, and I will send the letter to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY,
OFFICE OF THE FIRST VICE-PRESIDENT,
Raleigh, N. C., April 5, 1906.

Hon. JAMES HAY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Yours of April 4, stating that it had been repeatedly stated that the fast mail now run on the Southern road from Washington to New Orleans would be run and the present schedule maintained whether the appropriation carried in the appropriation bill was given or not, and you ask me to let you know whether or not this statement is correct.

No, sir; the statement is not correct. We could not afford to run this train without the appropriation. We will not run the train on the present schedule or at the present speed or with the present connections, nor exclusively as a mail-train, any longer than when the time expires under the terms of the contract with the Post-Office Department unless the appropriation is continued.

Yours, very truly,

A. B. ANDREWS,
First Vice-President.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to have been interrupted by the gentleman from Virginia, because that furnishes some information in this discussion.

I remember to have heard a distinguished gentleman, residing in a Congressional district in the State of Georgia, represented by a distinguished Member who has always supported this appropriation, say less than a week ago, upon a visit to the city of Washington, that if necessary, and if it was the only condition upon which these mail facilities could be continued, he could go about in that district and raise $40,000 for the purpose of continuing them.

Mr. WEBB. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. WEBB. You suggest that the advantage to be received from this extra appropriation is the right to control the schedule. Now, the Southern Railway has seven passenger trains leaving here every day, one leaving here at 7.35 a. m.; No. 97, leaving at 8 a. m; another at 10.51 a. m., and another at 11.15 a. m. Now, can you suggest a different schedule which would please the railroad better than those it now has for these south-bound trains?

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman may be trying to please the railroads, but I am trying to please the people of these great southern States, and this splendid section, who are entitled to a continuance of the great mail facilities they are enjoying.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, just one word more. The gentleman's suggestion was that the railroads ought to be paid for making these schedules leaving here in the morning. I contend that they made the schedules which were most suitable for the carrying of their necessary traffic south, and that they ought not to be paid for doing what their traffic demands that they should do.

Mr. SMALL. Has the gentleman finished his remarks?

Mr. WEBB. Just a moment further. I want to ask the gentleman if he is aware that the Postmaster-General says that the withdrawal of this special-facility pay causes no apprehension in his mind that the mail facilities would be crippled?

Mr. SMALL. I will say in the first place, in answer to the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, that I have not the confidence of the traffic managers of the Southern Railway or the other railways in the through line between Washington and New Orleans. I do not know what would be convenient or inconvenient to them in fixing the schedule of trains. The gentleman says that there are seven——

Mr. WEBB. Just one word there. The point I want to get at is, Have you ever heard the Southern Railway complain against the schedules that they now run out of Washington? That is the point I am getting at. In other words, ought they to be paid for making these schedules, which we contend are the most suitable for them for the carrying of their traffic?

Mr. SMALL. As I stated, Mr. Chairman, and repeat, I have no means of knowing what would be agreeable or disagreeable to the railroads.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from North Carolina allow me to suggest to him, in answer to his colleague, that the Post-Office Department unquestionably controls the time of the principal train, No. 97, because it requires a connection to be made at New Orleans with the Pacific train that leaves New Orleans at 11.45 in the morning; and in order to do that this train, 97, has to leave at 8 in the morning, and the distance of 1,144 miles can not be accomplished in less than 41 miles an hour.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. SMALL. Provided this is not extended too long.

Mr. HARDWICK. I understood the gentleman to make some statement about a gentleman from Georgia going around getting a popular subscription for the continuance of this subsidy, or whatever you want to call it. Would the gentleman mind telling us who that gentleman was; or would it be embarrassing to the gentleman? He has seen fit to quote him to the House.

Mr. SMALL. There were several gentlemen from the State of Georgia here a few days ago. It might embarrass them to state who they were, but I will state who the Member was. The statement was made in the presence of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], and he agreed that the statement was true, and agreed with them as to the value of this expedited mail service to his district. I believe I am violating no confidence in making the statement.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. SMALL. Just for a question.

Mr. HARDWICK. Who was the gentleman who made the statement that he would go around and get $50,000? Was he a Member of Congress?

Mr. SMALL. He was not, but he was a distinguished citizen of Georgia, who has the respect and confidence of the entire State, but whose name I am not at liberty to quote.

Mr. LEVER. How much was he willing to contribute himself?

Mr. SMALL. I take it that that is a question which adds nothing to the dignity of this discussion.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. As the gentleman is, no doubt, going to answer my argument, I wish to ask him if these are not the differences: I undertook to show that the only special facility involved in this appropriation was the attempted persuasion of the railroads by its use to keep their schedules which they themselves have made.

Mr. SMALL. I yielded to the gentleman for a question. But, Mr. Chairman, I said I was glad that the gentleman from Virginia had interrupted me and caused this letter to be read, because it sets at rest the statements which I have heard repeated in this House, not only at this session but at previous sessions in which gentlemen have said no authorized official of the Southern Railroad had given expression to the idea that if this special appropriation was withdrawn that these schedules would not be continued. I hope that statement will set these doubts at rest and——

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL (continuing). And that the letter written will be taken for what it is worth and give confidence to Members of the House——

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. My colleague perhaps refers to the statement I made in my speech?

Mr. SMALL. I had others in mind.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. There is nothing in that letter which contradicts the position I took in my speech. I said it might result in putting on other coaches. I do not understand that Colonel Andrews said that they would take off the train, but that the train will not run as an exclusively mail train and on the present schedule. I presumed they might put on other coaches and even then it would be only eighteen minutes later in getting to Charlotte if it made the speed of No. 31.

Mr. SMALL. I yield now to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. As I understand, and I want simply to ask the question, the gentleman argues that this appropriation enables the people along certain points of the Southern Railroad to enjoy exclusive and peculiar benefits not enjoyed by the inhabitants of the United States upon other railroads, and that these exclusive benefits should be continued to these persons if a subsidy is not forthcoming——

Mr. SMALL. Oh, I have given expression to no such sentiment and no such idea, Mr. Chairman. I have not given expression to any such sentiment as that.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman answer this question? Is it true that the people——

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman must have wanted to get in the word "subsidy," which has not been mentioned heretofore.

Mr. STANLEY. I do not care, a rose by any other name would smell as sweet; I would call it "steal."

Mr. SMALL. Undoubtedly you would. That would befit the gentleman's idea of the dignity of this debate.

Mr. STANLEY. Debate never gets too dignified to denounce a wrong.

Mr. SMALL. I object, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman making a speech; I yielded for a question.

Mr. STANLEY. And I meant to ask one very courteously.

Mr. SMALL. Well, I thought you had finished asking your question, and I said I had given expression to no such sentiment. If the gentleman has another question I will yield to him.

Mr. STANLEY. I would like to know, with all courtesy, whether it is true or not that the people along the Southern Railroad by virtue of this appropriation do receive peculiar benefit not received by other persons along other roads which do not receive these peculiar and special appropriations which the gentleman says are not a subsidy.

Mr. SMALL. That is a question, Mr. Chairman, of departmental and postal ethics, which I leave to the distinguished and learned gentleman from Kentucky to solve for himself. I have introduced no such idea into this discussion.

Mr. STANLEY. Nor have you contradicted the fact.

Mr. SMALL. I said that no intelligent man would deny the benefits accruing to the South from existing mail schedules. There are three through trains between Washington and New Orleans, which run via the Southern Railway to Atlanta, via the Western Railroad of Alabama from Atlanta to Montgomery, and via the Louisville and Nashville Railroad from Montgomery to New Orleans. The total distance is 1,144 miles. Train No. 35 leaves Washington at 11.15 a. m., eastern time, and arrives at New Orleans at 8.15 p. m. the following day, central time. This train consumes thirty-four hours' running time, and averages 34 miles per hour, including all stops. This train connects with the Southern Pacific Railway for all Texas points and southern California by train which leaves New Orleans at 9 p. m.

Train No. 37 leaves Washington at 10.45 p. m., eastern time, and arrives at New Orleans at 7.15 a. m. on the second morning, central time. The time consumed by this train is thirty-three running hours, and the train makes an average of 35 miles per hour, including all stops. These were the two great mail trains through the South, which received the special appropriation, until November 2, 1902, when there was a demand made by the Post-Office Department, as well as by the public, for a faster train. This resulted in the inauguration of an independent and faster train, known as "No. 97." This train carries no passengers between Washington and Atlanta, but consists of four mail cars and one express car. Between Atlanta and New Orleans, where the number of mail cars necessary are reduced, two passenger cars are attached, as I understand. This train leaves Washington at 8 a. m., eastern time, each morning in the year, and arrives at New Orleans at 11.15 a. m., central time, the following day. The time consumed is twenty-eight hours, and this train makes an average of 41 miles an hour, including all stops. At New Orleans train No. 97 connects with the Sunset Limited, which makes fast time via Houston, San Antonio, and El Paso to San Francisco, making possible the expedition of the mail through Texas and southern California and all connecting lines. The Post-Office Department absolutely controls the schedules of these three trains—Nos. 35, 37, and 97—as the records of that Department disclose.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. For a question.

Mr. WEBB. You say they control 37, 97, and 35?

Mr. SMALL. That is correct, as the gentleman can ascertain by inquiry of the Department.

Now I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. The gentleman says that the Department has some special control over train 35. Of course, the gentleman is aware that No. 35 gets no part of this special appropriation. Now, by what law or authority do they exercise any special control over train No. 35?

Mr. SMALL. In answer, Mr. Chairman, I will say I have not made inquiry to know whether this special appropriation is divided between certain trains or the portion in which it is divided.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. But the hearings——

Mr. SMALL. But it all goes to the railroad company; it goes to operate these three trains, and I take it it is not a material matter as to whether it is divided beween any trains, but the question is whether the Department, by its contract, controls the schedules of each of those three trains, as I have said.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I submit, however, the gentleman ought to know these facts, because they are in the hearings, where they say train 35 gets none of it, and the whole subsidy is divided between trains 37 and 97; that no part of it goes to train 35.

Mr. SMALL. Train No. 97 arrives in New Orleans in the forenoon instead of at night, thereby practically saving one day. These trains cover parts of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and with their connecting lines, particularly at Atlanta, cover the States of Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana. Train No. 97 expedites the mail along its main line between Washington and New Orleans from six to twelve hours and to San Francisco twenty-four hours. Many of the connecting lines, particularly at Atlanta, serve outlying sections twenty-four hours earlier. There is one special and gratifying advantage upon the connecting lines, particularly at Atlanta, in that by this train No. 97 these connecting trains may leave Atlanta at midnight in time to reach most of the post-offices on their lines so that the rural free-delivery routes may serve their patrons on the same day, thus saving large rural sections twenty-four hours in the delivery of their mail.

It has been urged that the Southern Railway enjoys large gross and net earnings. I shall not detain the House to state the financial conditions of this company. This information can be obtained from a number of reputable sources. But it is pertinent to ask, How does this affect the question at issue? Will any gentleman have the temerity to state that the Post-Office Committee in reporting these items were actuated by the desire to benefit the Southern Railway or any other railroad? Will any gentleman insult the integrity of this House by stating that the numerous Members who have supported this proposition were actuated by any such motive? I pause for a reply.

Even the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], who, in a spirit of invective, referred to this House as a "degraded body," will not claim that any such motive dominates the advocates of this appropriation. My distinguished colleague from North Carolina has been endeavoring to ascertain how much express matter is carried by train No. 97, and in the absence of information he has constructed an attractive estimate of profits from this source. He has also made an estimate of the cost of running this train. Surely he is qualifying himself as an expert on railroad operation, and is inviting upon himself the danger of becoming a railroad official and of being swallowed by the octopus. The glowing picture is not complete.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I think that a gentleman ought to know something about the cost and earnings of that train before he undertakes to vote on the question.

Mr. SMALL. We should have been favored with the financial status of the several other railroads upon which this expedited mail is carried. In truth, gentlemen should know that the poverty or prosperity of these several roads has nothing to do with the merits of this proposition. The primary object is to secure the maintenance of this quick mail service between Washington and New Orleans, and this appropriation is the only sure guaranty of its continuance. If the profit and the net earnings of these several lines of railway would justify Congress in the enactment of a law compelling these roads to adopt and maintain these schedules, or even faster schedules, then I would be in favor of such a law. Has one of the gentlemen in opposition introduced any bill and come before the committee by which such a result may be accomplished? Not one has done so. Gentlemen know that the object of the committee and the House is to secure expedition in the mails, and not to benefit any particular railroad.

It has been further contended that the Southern Railway is overcapitalized. This is undoubtedly a prevailing economic evil, and such a statement may be true for all that I know, and I shall be glad to join with the gentlemen at any time in any movement which seeks to remedy this evil and to restore in actual practice one of the basic principles of corporate law—that all the outstanding capital stock of a corporation shall be represented by money or property of equal value, but this does not affect the proposition.

It has been urged that the several lines between Washington and New Orleans already receive sufficient compensation under the statutory method of computing railway mail pay to justify these roads in maintaining the present mail schedule. This question of railway mail pay, as I have stated, is an intricate subject, and I feel quite sure that there are some inequalities in the adjustment of pay under the present statute, but whether these roads are receiving a sum in excess of the value of the service rendered these gentlemen do not know, and it can only be determined by careful investigation, which has not been made. There is one thing, however, which is known, or should be known, and that is, under the statute for adjusting railway mail pay there is no authority to compel a railroad to carry the mail by any arbitrary schedule fixed by the Department.

But it is further contended that if this great section traversed by the main line of these routes and their branches is entitled to this fast mail service, then it is the duty of the Southern Railway to maintain it. Mind you, no mention is made of any other railroad. This statement involves the very extreme of altruism. It costs more money to run fast trains; it is more expensive to run special mail trains. Yet these gentlemen, if they were railroad officials, would disburse this additional money and without increased compensation for doing so. I am inclined to agree with them in the academic proposition which they lay down, but they know that it is improbable and impracticable and adds nothing of value to the discussion.

There is one argument in opposition, however, which is considered invulnerable—that is, that this is a subsidy, and however wicked Republicans may vote on this question, that no Democrat can support it. How the changes have been rung on this word "subsidy." It is a term which has become more unpopular in recent years. A subsidy is pecuniary aid given for the promotion of a private enterprise from which some real or supposed public benefit will result. This is the popular and correct acceptation of the term, and the unpopular feature lies in the proposition to take money out of the public Treasury to foster one enterprise or industry, even though some good may indirectly result. The term has absolutely no application to these items of appropriation, and it is used simply for the purpose of prejudicing this House and the country. The object here is to expedite the mails, and not to benefit any railroad companies. Its opponents know this is true, but they do not admit it. If it is maintained that Congress provides appropriations for the administration of its Postal Department, which in many instances greatly exceed the revenue received from the particular feature of administration, then this appropriation bill is full of subsidies.

Let me mention a few. It is estimated by the Department that the net loss on every rural free-delivery route in the country is $300 per annum. On the 1st day of March, 1906, there were 35,031 rural routes, making a total loss to the whole country on this service of $10,509,300. Of course gentlemen will not call this a subsidy, because it would not be popular to do so. The committee have increased the appropriation for rural carriers in this bill by more than $3,000,000, and this increase will have the approval of the House. I hope this rural service will continue to grow and expand until every agricultural community in the country may enjoy the expedition of the mail which this rural service affords.

This bill carries an apropriation of $22,000,000 for city letter carriers, and under the law every city having more than 10,000 population, or whose post-office has a revenue of more than $10,000, may have city delivery. The only purpose of this large expenditure is for the convenience of the dwellers in the city, to have the mail brought to their homes instead of compelling them to go to the post-office for same. And yet, merely for the sake of convenience and with no adequate revenue to offset it, we are expending this large sum.

There was appropriated for the current fiscal year $500,000 for the transmission of mails by pneumatic tubes. This bill increases the appropriation to $900,000. I think we are going too rapidly in this direction, but the cities are demanding its extension. Pneumatic tubes only expedite the mail about thirty minutes, and have been installed in comparatively few cities.

These two items for appropriations for special facilities expedite the mails to hundreds of thousands of people from six hours to more than a day; yet gentlemen have inveighed for hours against these facilities for the South and have not uttered one word of criticism against the pneumatic-tube service. [Applause.]

If gentlemen wish another conspicuous illustration of so-called "subsidies," let me call their attention to the amounts appropriated to our foreign ocean mail service under the act of March 3, 1891. There are eight of these ocean mail routes, and to each steamship line forming the service an amount is paid greatly in excess of the amount of the full sea and inland postage thereon, with one exception, and that is the route from New York to Southampton, which yields a profit. I will call attention to a few of these routes:

Route No. 37: New York to Maracaibo; 26 trips; mileage paid at 66⅔ cents	$44,142.80
Amount at full sea and inland postage thereon	8,033.76
Excess of cost	36,109.04
Route No. 69: New York to Tuxpan; 52 trips; mileage paid at $1 per mile	130,629.00
Amount of full sea and inland postage on mails conveyed	23,738.24
Excess of cost over revenue	106,890.76
Route from San Francisco to Tahiti: 10 trips; distance one way, 4,212 statute miles; mileage paid at $1 per mile	$42,120.00
Amount of full sea and inland postage	1,153.28
Cost in excess of revenue	40,966.72

I will not give the details of the other routes. The total aggregate of excess of cost of this ocean-going service over the amount of revenue received is $462,597.64.

Tuxpan is a maritime town of Mexico, having a population of about 5,000, and is situated on a river about 5 miles from the Gulf of Mexico. It is 2,500 miles from New York.

Tahiti is a small narrow island, 32 miles long, and is one of the Society Islands in the Pacific Ocean. It is under French control, and is said to produce fine tropical fruits. It is populated by a few missionaries who have converted a part of the native population.

Surely we have overlooked Tuxpan and Tahiti. The steamship companies transporting the mail on these two routes alone receive an aggregate of $147,000 in so-called "subsidies." I beg to call the attention of other distinguished gentlemen who have not yet made speeches in opposition to these appropriations, to this bald and wicked subsidy for carrying the mails to Tahiti. Surely these gentlemen must also have overlooked this iniquity. Surely those gentlemen in opposition to these two items should not have overlooked this ocean service, and I call their attention to this and I ask them if they are in favor of Tuxpan and Tahiti and not the Crescent City of New Orleans. [Loud applause.]

It is an oversight for which I can find no possible explanation. Surely gentlemen are not actuated by motives of unfriendliness toward the Southern Railway or railroads in general. Perish such a profane idea. Surely no gentleman who has vigorously expressed denunciation of these special facilities has been speaking to "buncombe," has been seeking to acquire popularity at home. Surely no gentleman is seeking political preferment or promotion by these onslaughts upon the fast-mail appropriation. Each one would have us believe he is actuated by the purest and most unselfish motives and from a spirit of legislative integrity, and I for one have no disposition to destroy this illusion.

Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a newspaper clipping, which originally appeared in the New York Sun, and was copied by the Raleigh News and Observer. It contrasts the commercial, industrial, and financial condition of the South of to-day with the South of twenty-five years ago. It is a marvelous and eloquent story of growth and progress. I shall ask leave to insert it in the RECORD. Transportation is the life of trade, and quick mail service is the very lifeblood of commerce and progress. Before any Member votes to deprive this splendid section of this existing mail service, let him consider if he is acting justly by these people.

I concede to every Member honesty of purpose and legislative integrity. I impugn the motives of no man. If any Member holds that these appropriations are unnecessary, he will vote to strike them out, but if he believes they are necessary and constitute the only sure guaranty of the continuance of this fast mail to the Crescent City and to southern California, then he ought to vote for their retention. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the highest ideal for a Member of this House is to form a plan more or less elaborate, as his opportunities and his ability may warrant, for some form of legislation which shall benefit his State and his country, and that he ought to follow his ideal insistently and loyally. I believe it is the duty of a Member to bring to his constituents and to his State whatever of benefits he may from the administration of this great Government. I believe it is the duty of a Member to find something to encourage, and not to criticise; to help build, and not destroy. I do not subscribe to the doctrine credited to John Randolph of Roanoke, that it was the highest duty of a legislator to oppose, obstruct, criticise, and defeat all legislation. This policy has no appropriate place in this age. I believe in the policy of progression. I believe that an improved and expeditious mail service is the right of every citizen, and of every section of our common country. [Loud applause.]

The article referred to is as follows:

WONDERFUL GROWTH.

Until twenty-five years ago the South had hardly begun to crawl after the losses and disaster caused by war and reconstruction. It then began to branch out into new industries and to expand the old industries, and the growth has been truly wonderful. The people who have wrought so well have hardly paused long enough to contemplate what they have done with comparatively little capital and not much industrial skill. Here is a compact statement of how the South has prospered, the figures contrasting conditions twenty-five years ago and now, taken from the New York Sun:

From $257,000,000 invested in capital for factories to $1,500,000,000; increase, $1,243,000,000.

From $457,000,000 yearly value of products of factories to $1,750,000,000; increase, $1,293,000,000.
From $21,000,000 capital invested in cotton mills to $225,000,000; increase, $204,000,000.
From $313,000,000 annual value of cotton crop to $680,000,000; increase, $367,000,000.
From 225,000 bales of cotton used in the southern cotton mills to 2,163,000; increase, 1,938,000 bales.
From $39,000,000 yearly lumber products to $250,000,000; increase, $211,000,000.
From 397,000 tons of pig iron produced to 3,100,000 tons; increase, 2,703,000 tons.
From $261,000,000 yearly value of exports abroad to $555,000,000; increase, $294,000,000.
From $660,000,000 yearly value of farm products to $1,750,000,000; increase, $1,090,000,000.
From 20,600 miles of railroad to 60,000 miles; increase, 39,400 miles.
From 179,000 barrels of petroleum produced to 42,495,000; increase, 42,316,000 barrels.
From 45 cotton mills to 780; increase, 735 mills.
From $800,000 capital invested in cotton oil mills to $54,000,000; increase, $53,800,000.
From 667,000 spindles in cotton mills to 9,205,000; increase, 8,538,000 spindles.
From 211,377 tons of phosphate mined yearly to 1,087,429; increase, 876,061 tons.
From 397,776 tons of coke produced yearly to 6,244,185; increase, 5,846,409 tons.
To crown it all, from $3,051,000,000 assessed property valuation to $6,500,000,000, or an average increase of $3,449,000,000 a year for the twenty-five years.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Chairman, the railroad rate bill, which is to-day occupying so much of the attention of Congress and the public, is probably one of the most important measures which has been considered for many years.

As establishing a principle it is doubtless entitled to all the attention it is receiving, but as a practical matter when compared with the free-alcohol bill in point of a money consideration, or of the benefit to all of the people, it pales into insignificance.

With or without rate legislation I have little doubt that the railroads will be brought to dealing justly with the shippers, and the amount of money involved and the amount of money changing hands will not be very different in either case.

Free denatured alcohol will play a more important part in our industries and in the economy of daily living than any other agent or instrumentality.

Since we are all constantly receiving urgent letters and petitions from our constituents urging the enactment of legislation which will permit the use, free of tax, of grain or ethyl alcohol for industrial purposes, which has been made unfit for use as a beverage before passing from the custody of the Government, I would like to state my views on a phase of that question which I believe has been entirely overlooked, and which in my judgment demands the serious consideration of Congress at this time.

While the use of untaxed alcohol in manufacturing processes would unquestionably result in a very large extension of our domestic and foreign trade, and create employment for thousands of workmen where none exists at present, that side of the subject appears to be comparatively insignificant when we consider the adaptability of alcohol as a lighting and heating agent and as a motor fuel for farm engines, motor boats, etc.

I made it my duty to attend the recent hearings on this subject before the Committee on Ways and Means, and was especially impressed with the statements of the representatives of the builders of internal combustion engines, both with respect to the growing scarcity of gasoline, and the enormous development of that industry consequent on the general demand for such engines from the farmers in all sections of the country.

For instance, Mr. Capen, the representative of the Detroit Chamber of Commerce, testified that the manufacturers of that city alone will produce in 1906 enough of such engines to consume 200,000 gallons of liquid fuel per day, equal to a possible yearly consumption of, say, 60,000,000 gallons. Mr. Warnes, of the International Harvester Company, testified that it would be conservative to estimate that in the near future the internal-combustion engines in use in the United States will have a fuel-consuming capacity of 3,000,000 gallons per day, or nearly 1,000,000,000 gallons annually. Mr. Goebbels, of the Otto Gas Engine Works, of Philadelphia, which is a branch of the German works of the same name, testified that his company are now turning out each year, at Philadelphia, liquid-fuel engines aggregating 12,000 horsepower, which, when run on an everage of eight hours per day, have a fuel-consuming capacity of 6,000,000 gallons annually. He further stated that if untaxed denatured alcohol is granted by Congress, it would be conservative to estimate that the total number of engines his company would build each year would have a liquid fuel consuming capacity of 15,000,000 gallons annually. If any doubt existed in the minds of the committee as to the practicability of alcohol as a motor fuel for stationary engines, it was certainly dispelled by Mr. Goebbels.

The paper submitted by Prof. Elihu Thomson, of the General Electric Company, Lynn, Mass., and read at the hearings by my colleague from the Seventh Massachusetts district, contains most valuable data, very clearly and ably expressed, as to the utility of alcohol as a motor fuel, based on actual experiments. Professor Thomson refers to the recent experiments by his company, undertaken with the view of demonstrating the application of the internal-combustion engine to the propulsion of railway cars on short lines as feeders to the main lines. I quote the following from his statement:

> In this case an ordinary passenger railway car is equipped with a power compartment at one end, in which power compartment there will be installed an engine of, say, 200 horsepower of the internal combustion or explosion type. The growth of such a system is liable to be hampered in the near future by the cost of gasoline as a fuel, and the difficulties of using kerosene are still quite considerable. Especially is the exhaust likely to be offensive. In this case alcohol, which could be produced in unlimited amount, could be substituted.

It is, of course, impossible to estimate what the consumption of liquid fuel will be in that direction in the future, but it will certainly amount to many millions of gallons.

Ex-Governor Bachelder, of New Hampshire, master of the National Grange, testified that the National Board of Underwriters had announced that there are now in use in this country about 800,000 gasoline stoves and heaters. I am informed on reliable authority that the number of such stoves is now very much larger, exceeding possibly 1,500,000.

The active interest manifested in this subject by practically all the builders of internal-combustion engines in the country, when considered in connection with the statements of their representatives at the recent hearing, is, to my mind, conclusive evidence that the quantity of gasoline obtained from domestic petroleum is now far less than the demand for that form of liquid fuel, and unless an alternative fuel in the form of untaxed denaturized alcohol is given them by Congress the industry will be confronted by a very grave situation in the near future.

Not only is it believed that the present supply of gasoline is inadequate to meet the present demand, but there is at hand convincing evidence to show that the supply is rapidly decreasing. It is, perhaps, not generally known that gasoline in commercial quantities can only be obtained from petroleum having a paraffin base. This grade of petroleum is said to be chiefly obtained in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, and Indiana, but especially in Pennsylvania and West Virginia. The petroleum deposits of Louisiana, Texas, and California have, I am informed, almost entirely an asphaltic base, and hence do not supply sufficient gasoline or kerosene to be a factor in arriving at the total quantity produced. The Kansas, Indian Territory, and Oklahoma fields, while yet undeveloped, are said to yield very little gasoline. The Wall Street Journal in its issue of February 12 compares the yield of petroleum in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana in 1905 with that obtained in 1904, as follows:

State.	1905.	1904.	Decrease.
	Barrels.	Barrels.	Barrels.
Pennsylvania	28,043,987	30,316,329	2,272,342
Indiana and Ohio	18,944,537	21,392,895	2,448,358

Computing each barrel at 42 gallons, this is a falling off in 1905, compared with 1904, of 198,269,400 gallons of that grade of petroleum from which kerosene and gasoline are obtained.

Commenting on these figures, the Journal said in part:

> The feature of the year has been the falling off in the production of the Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Ohio fields, which produce the high-grade paraffine product. The consumption of oil in Pennsylvania the past year exceeded the production by 3,000,000 barrels, and Pennsylvania is now a steadily declining factor. Of a total production of crude oil in the United States the past year of 115,000,000 barrels, the Texas and California fields contributed 75,000,000 barrels, but the bulk of this product is unfit for illuminating purposes and is largely consumed as fuel.

The total quantity of benzine, naphtha, gasoline, etc., obtained from the crude oil in the United States in 1904 (based on official figures) is reported in the New York Tribune of February 16 as being 5,811,289 barrels, which at 42 gallons per barrel would be equal to 244,074,138 gallons. Of that quantity there were exported, according to official figures, 24,989,422 gallons, leaving for home consumption 219,084,716 gallons. The quantity of illuminating oil (kerosene) produced in 1904 is reported in the same article as being 27,588,654 barrels, equal to 1,158,623,468 gallons, computing each barrel at 42 gallons. Of that quantity 761,358,135 gallons were exported, leaving 397,265,333 gallons for home consumption.

The Tribune article also contains some interesting statistics comparing the production of petroleum in other countries with that of the United States, which have a most important bearing on the proposed legislation providing for untaxed denatured alcohol. I quote the following:

The total production (of the world) for 1904 (crude petroleum) was 9,303,000,000 gallons, of which 4,916,000,000 were credited to the United States. Russia, the greatest rival in this trade, produced 3,650,000,000 gallons. The balance (1,266,000,000) was distributed among Austria, Java and Sumatra, Roumania, British India, Japan, Canada, and Germany.

The exportation of illuminating oil, or kerosene, is also much greater from the United States than from Russia, American crude oil giving a much larger percentage of illuminating oil than does that of Russia. The total quantity of refined illuminating oil exported from Russia in 1904 was 455,000,000 gallons, and from the United States 761,000,000 gallons, or nearly double the quantity. Russian exports go largely to southwestern Europe, northern Africa, and southern and eastern Asia, while western Europe, eastern Asia, Oceania, and North and South America are the most important markets of the United States.

Of the total exports of the United States in 1904, 201,000,000 gallons went to Great Britain, 117,000,000 gallons went to Germany, 112,000,000 gallons went to the Netherlands, 41,000,000 gallons went to Belgium, 24,000,000 gallons went to France, 74,000,000 gallons went to other European countries, 70,000,000 gallons went to China, 39,000,000 gallons went to Japan, and 24,000,000 gallons went to Hongkong.

It is clear from the foregoing that Europe and Asia must continue to depend largely on the United States for their supplies of illuminating oil, naphtha, benzine, gasoline, etc. If we are forced to consume these petroleum products at home it will seriously affect the volume of our export trade, and since the price is practically fixed by the world's demand, our own people would then be forced to pay very much higher prices than at present.

It can not be successfully denied that our deposits of that grade of petroleum from which kerosene and gasoline are produced are diminishing at an alarming rate, and that the enormous development now going on in the motor industry will result in creating a demand for liquid fuel which can not be supplied from petroleum distillates.

The estimates made of the quantity of liquid fuel which will be required in the near future for lighting, heating, and internal-combustion engines have been shown to be considerably in excess of 1,000,000,000 gallons. To supply that demand, conceding that all our kerosene and the lighter distillates are consumed at home, we have 1,158,623,468 gallons of kerosene and 244,074,138 gallons of lighter distillates, or a total of 1,402,697,606 gallons.

I have not undertaken to submit my views on this important subject without first consulting the United States Geological Survey. The chief of the division of that Department in charge of petroleum statistics, Professor Day, stated that the present demand for that grade of gasoline suitable for use in internal-combustion engines was now far in excess of the supply, and that the manufacturers of such engines in the near future would be seriously hampered unless some liquid fuel, such as alcohol, could be obtained at reasonable cost.

I am also informed on reliable authority that our manufacturers of agricultural implements are now finding it difficult to sell the farmers agricultural machinery requiring power, owing to the scarcity of fuel to run the engines; and I am also informed that the farmers are very much disinclined to purchase the so-called "gasoline engines," in view of the approaching famine in fuel.

My esteemed colleague from North Dakota, in testifying on this subject before the Committee on Ways and Means, said: "Now, right in my town the Standard Oil Company has a distributing point and large tanks. They don't keep gasoline of high grade fit for use in gasoline engines. I have three gasoline engines and know."

The Standard Oil Company are not at fault. They would, I am sure, gladly supply gasoline of the grade required for motor use, but the simple truth is they can not possibly supply the demand, which is constantly increasing.

In order to properly comprehend the magnitude of the subject it is necessary that some attention should be paid to the quantity of commercial alcohol this country is capable of furnishing for light, heat, and power purposes. As you all know, alcohol can be abundantly produced from all staple grains. It can, I believe, be obtained more cheaply in large quantities from Indian corn than other farm products.

Our corn crop for the last year is said to be, in round numbers, 2,750,000,000 bushels. It was absolutely established at the hearing by competent witnesses that at least 2.6 gallons of alcohol testing 94 per cent could be produced on an average by the larger distilleries from a bushel of corn. The corn crop of last year would therefore yield, if converted into 94 per cent alcohol, 7,150,000,000 gallons of alcohol, which is 2,234,000,000 gallons more than the total quantity of crude petroleum produced in the United States in 1904. The difference between the corn crop of 1904 and that of 1905 is said to be, in round numbers, 250,000,000 bushels. If converted into 94 per cent alcohol, it would yield 650,000,000 gallons. If we compare this quantity with the quantities of kerosene and gasoline consumed in the United States for 1904 (616,350,049 gallons), it would be seen that the difference between the corn crop of 1905 and that of 1904 would produce 33,649,951 gallons of 94 per cent alcohol in excess of the total quantity of kerosene and gasoline now annually consumed in this country.

At this time, when our farmers are threatened with the loss of an important foreign market for their surplus corn and meats, the enactment of this legislation would be doubly welcome, as it would provide new domestic markets for at least as much corn as is now exported, or used in feeding cattle for export. To the corn grower it would certainly be as satisfactory to sell his product for use in this country as to sell it for export, or to be used in producing meat for the export trade. And while I am in favor of every effort being made by Congress to keep open foreign markets for our farm products, I think it is still more important that we should open up the large additional domestic markets which would be made possible by giving our farmers an opportunity to supply this valuable material for lighting, heating, and motor fuel purposes.

In this connection I wish to direct attention to the statement made by Dr. H. W. Wiley, of the Department of Agriculture, in testifying before the Committee on Ways and Means on February 8. Referring to the benefits to the farmers which would result from the removal of the internal-revenue tax from nonpotable alcohol, he said:

The farmer can grow any amount of starch and sugar that may be wanted for any purpose in the world. There is no limit to the amount of sugar and starch which the farmers of this country can grow, and not a pound of starch or sugar takes one element of fertility from the soil.

This, it seems to me, is a view of the subject which is of very great importance to our farmers. Eminent scientists have for some time past been pointing out the wastefulness of our system of exporting to foreign countries, in the shape of grain or meats, the fertile constituents of our soil. By furnishing domestic markets for our surplus corn crops we will keep in this country those elements of fertility which are essential to the welfare of our agricultural interests, and will prevent a further extension of the process of soil exhaustion which is manifest in many sections of the country.

Free alcohol will stimulate many industries that have hitherto languished, and will give new birth to many more that have never been able to live in this country, owing to the high cost of alcohol.

The chairman of Ways and Means in reporting the bill to the House has made a most excellent report, in which he has given a list of many important industries that will be benefited by free alcohol. But there is one industry that I desire to bring to your notice. It is the manufacture of artificial silk. It requires about one and a half gallons of alcohol to make a pound of artificial silk; with the tax this means a cost of about $1 per pound, whereas with free alcohol it should be made for 65 to 75 cents per pound. I have here for your inspection several samples of artificial silk made with alcohol and cotton. It is a nitrocellulose product, and in point of luster outshines real silk and is useful for many purposes.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Where is it made?

Mr. LOVERING. It is made in France. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not indulge in idle dreams; I do not expect any miracles to be wrought by this legislation; but this much can be said, that if our coal mines should peter out and our oil wells dry up and our forests be burned down this country would still not want for a cheap agent for heat, light, and power. [Loud applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, when this Post-Office bill was first brought up for consideration before the House it was not my purpose nor my desire to submit any remarks for the consideration of the committee. And in what I have to say I shall certainly, as I am always disposed to do at all times and under all conditions in life, accord to every gentleman who has spoken on the subject of "special facilities for trunk lines" the same credit for honesty, sincerity, and uprightness of purpose that I claim for myself. Every gentleman on the floor of this House is entitled to that, and no less than that; and every gentleman who enjoys the distinguished honor and privilege of being a Member of this great body of the House of Representatives accords to every other gentleman that meed of praise.

It is not my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to undertake to discuss the postal policy of our Government. Suffice it for me to know, as I have been informed, that fully 85 per cent of the mails of our country are transported by railroads. The Government owns no railroads, owns no facilities by which it can expedite the mails that it desires to carry to and among the people throughout the country. The express company is in the same condition; therefore the Government is compelled to look to these railroads for accommodation and for the privilege and opportunity and make some arrangement with them for serving and expediting the mails of the people. It is therefore proper, and it is necessary for us when we enter upon the consideration of this question to proceed upon the theory and the basis that the railroads are entitled to a fair, just, and remunerative compensation for the services they render. No other standard, just and fair, can possibly be erected than that. I think, Mr. Chairman, when we come to consider such subjects as this, we ought not to overlook the real true theory which the Government has in view in the transportation of the mails.

I dare say that there is not a gentleman on the floor of this House who will contend for a moment that we expect to make money out of the postal service. Indeed, I can go one step further, and say, not as a member of the Post-Office Committee, for I am not a member of it, but simply reflecting the ordinary sentiments of a layman citizen, that the post-office affairs of the country are not and can not be conducted, on the beneficent lines intended, upon the usual standards of business principles. Why is that? The objects of the postal system would be defeated. Take the revenue that the Government derives from letters—about 90 cents, by sale of stamps—by the pound, and then look at the amount the Government derives as revenue from the transportation of second-class postal matter, newspapers and magazines. Only $6,000,000 comes from that source as revenue, while the Government pays out over thirty-three millions for it. Is that in accordance with business principles? Why, no. If business principles governed the policy of the Post-Office Department, the Government would raise the postal charges on second-class mail.

But the purpose of the Government is to aid and educate the people, to disseminate useful and valuable literature, to send papers, books, and everything that will elevate the moral standard of the people and foster a better citizenship and give them the opportunity to become acquainted with public matters, and teach them and inspire them with religious feelings and other lofty sentiments, which they acquire through newspapers, tracts, and other publications and periodicals, and to do this in the cheapest and most expeditious manner to them. I was surprised to hear some of the gentlemen who took part in this debate say, or rather suggest, that the rate for the transportation of second-class mail matter ought to be doubled or trebled. What does that mean? The rate is 1 cent now. We derive $6,000,000 from it as an annual revenue. Double it and it is $12,000,000. Treble it and it is $18,000,000, absolutely wiping out the deficit in the Post-Office Department.

I say here in my place as a Representative on this floor that in my judgment the Government can not exercise its bounty more generously than to put the very lowest postal rate that it can upon newspapers and periodicals. [Applause.] Why is that so? How will you draw the discrimination? Take the home paper, the paper that is issued at the end of each week. It goes to the homes of the people. It reaches the masses of the people. It is the friend of the people; they are fond of it—look forward to its coming. It is a welcomed visitor, and great numbers of the people of a county hardly read any other paper except the weekly home paper. The great city dailies are not frequent visitors to many of their homes. It is these weekly papers that furnish a pleasing source of communication with the people of different sections of the same county, telling their neighbors and their friends of their sorrows and joys in a way that the great daily papers can never do. It is the home paper that supports all the public enterprises by appealing to the pride of its subscribers. Without the support and sympathy of the home weekly paper but few enterprises can be made a success. It stands for purity, morals, and religion. It stands for the schools and education.

Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that I do not see the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN] in his seat. I was very much pained when I heard the remarks he made the other day about criticisms that had been and were being passed upon him by the people of his own State, by the newspapers, and by some in his own district, with the gentle hints that his people desired him to support the appropriation for the fast mail from Washington to New Orleans; and it occurred to me, Mr. Chairman, judging from the spirit of the gentleman's speech, that if we accept the truth of the old adage, that "The force of the shot is determined by the fluttering of the birds," certainly those North Carolina newspapers must have criticised him with a good deal of vigor, because he manifested a great deal of fervor in the argument he was making on these "special facilities for trunk lines." That spirit, Mr. Chairman, is growing throughout the South.

I have never heard the gentleman from North Carolina, my worthy good friend [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN], make anything else than a logical, substantial, good speech on any subject he undertakes to make one on. He made a good, ingenious speech the other day, a strong speech; but his foundations and his premises were all wrong, and therefore the superstructure that he built will tumble and fall.

Why, it is a new theory that he recommends here. Suppose a man had a farm of 100 acres and was raising so much product. Some of it was poor and some of it was very fertile. Do you suppose that he would take the 10 acres that was very fertile and raise a bale of cotton an acre to make an estimate on for what all the balance would produce? Why, no; he would make a general or average estimate. The gentleman from North Carolina did not do that. You would have thought from reading his speech, and any gentleman who will take it and read it in the RECORD would believe that the special facilities were in force only from Washington to Lynchburg and Danville and Charlotte, N. C.

Mr. Chairman, I have made as careful examination as I can make, and I do not want to make any statement in this matter except it is based on facts. It doesn't amount to anything to state what the railroad has made—$1,400,000—out of the Government. If it makes that amount, it makes it by the law and by contract. It performs the service and the Government pays for it, as the law provides. It cuts no figure in this discussion at all. That is a mere appeal against a corporation. That is a favorite pastime with some of our friends. I have undertaken to ascertain the facts as thoroughly as I can in answer to the guessing bee engaged in by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN] and my friend from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

What is the question before the House about this southern fast mail, this appropriation that is necessary in order to secure the continuation of the special mail train between Washington and New Orleans, a distance of about 1,137 miles? I think it is important, Mr. Chairman, to have the exact understanding as to what the question really is. The language in the post-office appropriation bill is "for necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Washington to Atlanta and New Orleans, $142,728.75." In order, Mr. Chairman, that there may be no misunderstanding I read from the RECORD extracts showing the basis of the arguments of both the gentlemen from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON]:

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. But taking things as they are, I propose to show that No. 97 is a train of great profit to the railway company, exclusive of the subsidy. I presume that it carries the same proportion of the mail from Danville to Charlotte as from Washington to Danville. In a letter replying to an inquiry from me, General Shallenberger, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, on February 23, 1906, said that at the last quadrennial weighings it was computed that No. 97 carried 35 per cent of the whole weight of mail between Washington and Danville, and that 35 per cent was 45,183 pounds.

Now, Mr. Chairman, No. 97 therefore gets 35 per cent of the transportation mail pay. The entire regular mail-transportation pay from here to Charlotte is, exclusive of car rents, $525,974.52, and 35 per cent thereof, which goes to No. 97, is $184,091.08, to which add the rental of the three post-office cars to Charlotte, $28,521, and we have a total of regular pay for No. 97 from here to Charlotte of $212,612.08; and, of course, it gets large pay from Charlotte to Atlanta, but not as much per mile as from here to Charlotte. There is not so much mail handled between those two places as from here to Charlotte, and there is not as much from Danville to Charlotte as from here to Danville. To this must be added what No. 97 receives from the express company, for it is a mail and express train. We know that a carload of express is much heavier than a postal carload of mail, perhaps three times as great, as the postal cars must have racks and plenty of space for the clerks to conveniently distribute the mail. But suppose the Southern's No. 97 only collects from the express company one-fourth of what it collects from the Government, which would be $53,153.02, then it earns from here to Charlotte, exclusive of the subsidy, $265,765.10, while its part of the subsidy from here to Charlotte is $23,767.50. With these facts staring one in the face, can he contend that a train that otherwise earns $265,765.10 will be discontinued if the subsidy is withdrawn?

* * * * * * *

Another fact, for the year ending June 30, 1904, being the last year for which I have been able to get the statistics on this point, the average earnings of the Southern's passenger trains in Virginia, North and South Carolina, and these earnings include passenger, mail, and express, were less than 99 cents for each mile such trains ran, while the average earnings of train No. 97 from here to Charlotte, exclusive of the subsidy, according to figures above stated, are $1.91 for each mile run, or nearly double the general average.

Mr. STEENERSON. They told me that Monday was the lightest day for mail, and that on other days of the week they had two storage cars in that train, three R. P. O. cars, and an express car. Until it reaches Atlanta it carries no passengers, but when it reaches Atlanta passenger cars are attached, and instead of running 42 miles an hour it comes down to 35 miles, the ordinary speed for a passenger train. Now, then, that condition of the mails, with 40,000 pounds in the two storage cars and 10 tons in the three R. P. O. cars, makes 60,000 pounds in the three cars—30 tons of mail. They probably had 50 tons including the express car. Assuming that they get the lowest price—which is not correct; but I will assume now they get the price on the densest route, 6 cents per ton per mile—if they had 50 tons they get $3 per train mile, whereas the cost of operating a railroad train of that class was $1. If, therefore, the Southern Railroad carries mail from Washington to New Orleans in storage cars and R. P. O. cars, with an average load of 10 tons per car in the train, they receive in weight pay alone three times what it costs to run it.

The gentleman from North Carolina put the sum of what the train (No. 97) earns at $1.91 for each mile. Both speeches are based upon "ifs," conditions, suppositions, and presumptions, as shown by the above sample extracts. The gentleman from North Carolina says, "I presume that it (No. 97) carries the same proportion of the mail from Danville to Charlotte as from Washington to Danville." A most violent presumption. And yet on that "presumption" he figured out the earnings of that train to be $265,765.10.

Mr. STEENERSON says "they probably had 50 tons, including the express car," and "assuming that they got the lowest price." It was upon vague and indefinite probabilities and assumptions that these two gentlemen based their conclusions. It is not an appropriation to the Southern Railway; it is not an appropriation for special mail trains to Lynchburg, 171 miles, nor a special train to Danville or to Charlotte, but for a special mail train to New Orleans, a distance of 1,137 miles. The people of Alabama, where I have the pleasure to live, are not at all interested in any fast mail train to Lynchburg or to Danville or to any point that merely affects North Carolina, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN] seems to think. What we are interested in is to have the present fast mail service to New Orleans continued, and I think I will be able to show that this service is of the greatest advantage to the business interests of the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas.

Another thing, Mr. Chairman: This subject has been discussed mainly in the way of opposing the Southern Railway, but there are three roads that have to be consulted before this fast mail service to New Orleans can be carried out. We have to consider the Louisville and Nashville road from Montgomery to New Orleans, and the Western Railway of Alabama from Atlanta to Montgomery. They are a part of this line. This special-facility compensation amounts to $125 per mile, so that the Louisville and Nashville line, which is about 300 miles long, is interested to the extent of thirty-seven or thirty-eight thousand dollars. Now, this 1,137 miles of the road between here and New Orleans has more than one mail route; it comprises five different mail routes, over various routes carrying different weights of mail. In the Post-Office Department an average railway mail route is about 140 miles. Some of them carry as much as 100,000 pounds a day, and some of them do not carry 35,000 pounds a day. None of this extra compensation of $142,728.75 is paid to any railroad where the trains that perform the service are over five minutes late in arriving at the destination on any one of these five different routes.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption? From what statistics does the gentleman read? I have just come in.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. My information was derived from the Post-Office Department and other sources.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. What train do you regard as a counterpart of train 97? Which one of the trains coming north do you regard as the counterpart of train 97?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Do you suppose the train remains in New Orleans? Do you think a fair estimate can be made of the cost of a train which is simply estimated one way?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. The gentleman understands this—that 97 only runs one way?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No; I understand that it comes back.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. And I gave the figures taken from the Post-Office Department and my own estimate of the express from here to Charlotte. Has the gentleman any information that will contradict the figures that I gave?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes, sir; I think I have reliable figures which will contradict the basis of your calculations, and I will furnish them.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I would be glad if the gentleman will call my attention to any figure which he thinks is inaccurate.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I have pointed them out in your speech.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. April 6? I challenge the gentleman to point to one incorrect statement and figure in that speech.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Now, I am giving you the result of a statement that I carefully prepared.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I ask the gentleman to find any inaccurate statement in the figures which I gave.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. You said this, in addition to what I have already quoted from your speech:

Another fact: For the year ending June 30, 1904, being the last year for which I have been able to get the statistics on this point, the average earnings of the Southern's passenger trains in Virginia, North and South Carolina—and these earnings include passenger, mail, and express—were less than 99 cents for each mile such trains ran, while the average earnings of train No. 97 from here to Charlotte, exclusive of the subsidy, according to figures above stated, are $1.91 for each mile run, or nearly double the general average.

Why did you not make the estimate not from here to Charlotte, N. C., but from here to New Orleans, where the train ends?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I stated why in my speech the other day; I only had an hour for a speech and I did not get through then.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. And I have only thirty minutes.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. You can not deny the accuracy of any figures you read there.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. And I say in the presence of this House I want to challenge their figures. I have officially a statement of the facts. I got it from a careful entry, Mr. Chairman, as to the amount of express matter which the gentleman, in his estimate the other day, said amounted to $53,000. I got a careful estimate, and I am assured upon reliable authority that the express matter carried on that particular train is insignificant. Why is it insignificant? It is absolutely through express; there is no messenger on that train, and what little express it has goes through to New Orleans, and the report is that it is insignificant; yet on the guesses and "ifs" of the gentleman from North Carolina, he makes the estimate of the express on that train valuable to the amount of $53,000.

The reason why I have called particular attention to what is the exact question is that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN] and others have discussed it as if it were a proposition for fast mail train from Washington to Lynchburg, or from Washington to Charlotte, for the benefit of the Southern Railway, and they have, by examining only the conditions between Washington and Lynchburg, or Washington and Charlotte, got what seems to me a wrong impression of this question. Anyone familiar with railroad matters in the South knows that the 171 miles from here to Lynchburg is not only the most profitable of the whole 7,000 miles in the Southern Railway system, but is the most profitable business route of any 171 miles south of the Potomac or Ohio rivers, not only for mail, but for freight, passengers, and express. This is the very throat of the Southern Railway system. All of its through business from the entire North and the cities of the North of every character is poured over this 171 miles, so that the earnings upon the short distance of the route are undoubtedly heavy.

Now, the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], in discusing this subject, have practically ignored the fact that this is a service to New Orleans, but have selected out of this entire mileage of 1,137 miles the one mail route from here to Lynchburg, or to Charlotte, over which all the mails of this railroad system are carried, as if the weight and the earnings upon the line from here to Lynchburg or to Charlotte were typical of the mail business and the mail earnings of this entire line, when, in fact, it is a very condensed and concentrated traffic and not in any sense typical, and to undertake to call attention to that dense traffic conveys, it seems to me, a totally misleading idea of the situation that confronts our people in Alabama and Mississippi and Louisiana and Texas, who get the chief benefit from this appropriation.

There is undoubtedly a very heavy mail starting out from Washington, although not more than one-half as heavy as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] guessed there was from looking on the outside of the train one Monday morning—that is, the fast mail train No. 97. Does all of that mail go to New Orleans? By no means, nor does the half of it go to New Orleans, nor the third of it; but the train itself and all the expenses of the train do go clear to New Orleans, and must come back to Washington; and no fair-minded man would think of estimating what it earns except by considering the proposition as being one from Washington to New Orleans and back to Washington.

At Lynchburg the mail for all that portion of Virginia west of Lynchburg, and in addition thereto all of the mail for the State of Tennessee, is put off the train.

At Danville all mail for southern Virginia and northern North Carolina is put off.

At Greensboro the mail for eastern and southeastern North Carolina, including the city of Wilmington, all leaves train No. 97.

At Charlotte all mail for the State of South Carolina, except the northern portion; all mail for southern Georgia, including the city of Savannah, and all of the mail for the State of Florida, except five counties in western Florida.

At Atlanta practically all of the Georgia mail is put off; also all of the mail for central and northern Alabama and Mississippi, to be forwarded via Birmingham and Meridian to Shreveport.

So that, Mr. Chairman, this is a rapidly diminishing tonnage, and it is manifestly very unfair to confine our attention to theoretical estimates of earnings of trains between Washington and Lynchburg, or Charlotte, as these gentlemen have thought proper to do.

Now, I do not agree with the extreme guesses on the weight or earnings of mail that is carried on this train (No. 97) between Washington and Charlotte, made by the gentlemen from North Carolina and Minnesota, and I do not think they are important for this reason.

From the records of the Post-Office Department I have calculated the exact earnings which these railroad companies receive for performing this service from Washington to New Orleans, as it is being performed—the round trip. There is no other fair way to consider it. The cars that start from Washington on No. 97 go through to New Orleans, and they come back from New Orleans to Washington. While the Post-Office Department divides this $142,728 (or at the rate of $125 per mile of railroad), nominally between the two trains going south—that is, trains No. 97 and No. 37—the service is only half performed, for the trains must come north with a very light load of mail, and the true way to find a just conclusion is to learn what is the average earnings per train mile in this service conducted both ways, as it is, and must be conducted. These records show that the average mail earnings (that includes the weight and the postal-car pay, but not this appropriation pay), is for the one train, No. 97, for its round trip, 65½ cents per train mile, and for the other train, No. 37, for its round trip, 54 cents per train mile from Washington to New Orleans and back again to Washington.

But suppose we take the actual figures of earnings of the train No. 97 alone—one way. It runs from Washington to New Orleans, a distance of 1,137 miles, every day in the year, which is 415,000 miles yearly, and receives from the Government for what is called the "weight compensation" for carrying the mails, $342,953, and for postal-car pay, $53,760, or a total mail pay of $396,714 yearly.

At Atlanta at midnight a coach is attached to the train which runs to New Orleans. The total passenger earnings on this train between Atlanta and New Orleans last year were $53,000.

Adding this to the mail-pay earnings, the entire earnings of train No. 97 from all sources amounts to $449,714 a year, which, divided by the 415,000 train miles which this train runs every year, makes its actual official earnings $1.08 per train mile. That does not sound much like $3 per train mile that was guessed at by the gentleman from Minnesota just from looking at the outside of the cars one Monday morning, nor the extravagant guessing as to earnings of the gentleman from North Carolina. My figures are official, and I can safely challenge their contradiction.

I made a very careful inquiry as to the amount of express matter carried on this train No. 97. Statistics are not kept, but I am assured upon reliable official authority that the express carried on that particular train is insignificant.

Now, is $1.08 per train mile excessive? I hold in my hand the last official and printed report of the Southern Railway for the year ending July 1, 1905.

This report shows the average earnings per train mile of every train operated over the 7,200 miles of the Southern road, including thousands of miles of branch lines, as $1.53 per train mile.

Will not every fair-minded man agree that an expensive train of this character ought to earn at least as much as the average of all the hundreds of trains that run over the road?

This appropriation amounts to 17 cents per train mile, and if it is added, then train No. 97 will earn for the Southern Railway $1.25 per train mile, which is 28 cents per train mile less than the average earnings of all the trains on the Southern Railway, passenger, freight, and mixed.

I further read from this same printed report that is filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission that the operating expenses of the Southern Railway last year were $1.12 per train mile. To this should be added 36 cents for interest and fixed charges, making the actual cost $1.48 per train mile—that is, this train No. 97, the special mail train from Washington to New Orleans, this very heaviest mail train, now earns just $1.08 per train mile from all sources, and if we make this appropriation it will earn $1.25 per train mile, while the average train-mile cost of all trains over the Southern Railway is officially known and stated to be $1.48.

If we make this appropriation the train will not then earn within 23 cents of the average cost of operating all their trains, and this train, because of the high average rate of speed (41 miles an hour) is the most expensive train they run because it makes all other trains stand aside and give it the right of way.

I am not a railroad man, Mr. Chairman, but I can state that I would never operate an expensive train like this over 1,137 miles of railroad at an average speed of 41 miles an hour unless I could get back at least approximately the average cost of trains over my railroad, and they can not do that here including interest and fixed charges into 23 cents per train mile, even if we make this appropriation.

The same old inquiry comes up here, of course, whether that railroad is actually losing money on this business, because it does not get back its average cost.

I can answer that best, I think, by reading and indorsing what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEDGE] said on that point in his most excellent speech published in the RECORD of April 5:

> The postal car, carrying only two or three tons of mail, earns less for the railroad than its ordinary passenger coach; the special mail train, run at thundering speed, earns less than the actual average cost of its passenger-train service. Shall we from this conclude that the roads are carrying the mails at a loss? No; that does not appear to me a reasonable conclusion. In the average train-mile cost of passenger service on the Pennsylvania was included 38 cents for "interest and fixed charges." These would continue about the same if the road carried no mails. In this average train-mile cost are included all the items of maintenance of the roadway, station service, clerks, superintendence, and many others which would go on practically undiminished if no fast mail trains were operated.
> Railroads undoubtedly accept and are glad to get many lines of business which pay less than the average cost of operation per car or per train. There is some profit to them if they can earn from the particular traffic something beyond the actual cost to them of handling that traffic. The mails are a necessity to the people and the people are the customers of the railroad.
> The Government, in this respect, is fortunate in finding this machine to command; more fortunate far, in my opinion, than if it owned the machine itself, with all its responsibilities and risks. The railroads seem willing to accept the business at the existing rates and to comply as to apartment cars and postal cars and special trains with the exacting and expensive wishes and requirements of the Post-Office Department, and I doubt if there are many railroad managers who know exactly whether they are making money on the business or not. What should be the attitude of Congress? I believe that there are few Members of this House who are not willing for the Government to pay the railroads for carrying the mails not only that proportion of expense which is properly chargeable to this class of their traffic, but such additional expense as they necessarily incur in according to us unusual space in cars and extraordinary facilities in speed, and we are also willing to pay the proportional share of a fair return upon the capital invested. Some of the roads are probably being thus compensated at the present time, but I doubt if many of them are, if the truth was known, so urgent have been the demands of the public for greater frequency and promptness in the mail service and judging from the evidence before the Wolcott Commission and the opinions of men who know how the business is conducted.

And right here, Mr. Chairman, an injustice might be done to the officials responsible for the policy of these railroads by the insinuation that because their mail earnings from here to Charlotte are good, or because their general business is better than it was in the period of depression a few years ago, that they would be unpatriotic if they declined to operate these special mail trains through to New Orleans, even at a loss. I can not agree with this view. Upon that principle we might ask them to run the trains for nothing. It is their duty to endeavor to make each class of their traffic self-sustaining, and no customer can fairly ask them to perform a service that yields returns below the average cost of operating the road, including interest, taxes, and other fixed charges.

They say, and, so far as I know, they speak truly, and as the actual official statements of earnings show that the weight of the mails over this whole through line—Washington to New Orleans—is so light that, including the necessary expense for the return of the cars to Washington, practically empty, many of them, they can not possibly get out of the business, at the rates fixed by law, enough money to meet the average cost of operation and fixed charges. If that is true, it seems a plain proposition that if the public wants this special service it ought to be willing to pay for it.

This is not a matter that the Southern Railway could handle alone if it tried. This train would be of little value unless it reached New Orleans to connect with the Southern Pacific. But between Atlanta and New Orleans the weight of mails is less than one-third the weight from Washington to Lynchburg, and the roads west from Atlanta will not join in the through service by special trains unless they can receive more than the pay provided in the general law.

When they decline to cooperate the whole scheme fails, and I therefore regard it as unjust to hold officials of the Southern road responsible if this service is discontinued.

The question of its value to the roads between Atlanta and New Orleans is equally important with that between Washington and Charlotte, and is really the main question, as it affects the people of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas.

The facts as to the actual earnings of these three roads from this service make it seem unjust to stigmatize this appropriation as possessing the offensive features of a "subsidy" in the sense of a gratuity—the granting of a gift—something for nothing.

It is no more a "gratuity" than the earnings per train mile of $1.56 that are paid to some northern roads for special mail trains compared with the total $1.25 per train mile which train No. 97 will receive if we make this appropriation. Why are they paid $1.56 per train mile? Because they have the weight of mail to carry.

Why do we not give them special compensation for running special trains? Because the tonnage they receive gives them a fair compensation. Give these southern roads anything like their tonnage and they will, I suppose, be "delighted" to conduct business in the same way.

Is it not a mistaken idea that these roads are going to lose money if we fail to make this appropriation and they discontinue these trains? Will there not be the same weight of mails to carry? Will they not require the same number of postal cars? Somebody must do this business, and there is nobody else who can do it except these companies.

They will simply carry the mails upon slower trains, and if my judgment as a layman is of any value, they will make more net money than to receive this appropriation and continue to perform the service as they are now doing.

Why do the people of Alabama and the business men of all that region of country west and south of Atlanta so much desire the special service to which this appropriation is applied?

It is not because fast mail trains are run in the North, nor from any feeling of mere pride, but because, with their connections, these trains have proved of the greatest benefit to our people in ways which only men engaged in actual business can appreciate and understand. Many other trains are scheduled to connect with these. For instance, upon the arrival of train No. 97 in Atlanta another train was immediately put on and run to Birmingham, and through this and its connections many towns and cities in Alabama and Mississippi are undoubtedly served with mail twelve to twenty hours earlier than they would be otherwise, and in like manner the benefits of this service are felt all over the South.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN] stated in his speech that the time schedules and the speed of train No. 97 are not regulated by the Post-Office Department.

He is mistaken. He does not know the facts.

The Post-Office Department requires this train to start from Washington immediately after the arrival of the important through mails from Boston and New York. This makes it leave here at 8 a. m.

The Department also requires it to connect with the "Sunset Limited" of the Southern Pacific at New Orleans, which leaves that city the next morning at 11.55.

To make this time the train No. 97 must run an average of 41 miles an hour. This is faster than the time on any other single-track road in the United States for the same long distance.

The Post-Office Department, therefore, does regulate the time schedule and the speed of train No. 97, as it does of all fast mail trains in this country.

I have, Mr. Chairman, presented what I believe to be the plain facts on this proposition to secure an appropriation that simply means to expedite mails in certain sections of the South.

Mr. Chairman, I admit that I regret that when we come here earnestly asking our northern friends to come to our aid and help us in securing an appropriation violative of no sound principle or policy, that certain people of the South believe is of great advantage to them from purely a business standpoint, that southern Representatives rise in their seats and denounce it as a "steal," and call it "robbing the Treasury;" call it "an octopus."

I tell you, Mr. Chairman, that such fiery and unreasonable and unjustifiable denunciations of Federal aid for the good of the people such as we have heard in this debate in some portions of the South some years ago met with some response, but it is not true now. The gentleman from North Carolina has heard the ominous mutterings of his own people. The South is growing—growing not only in the development of its agricultural and mineral resources, but in broadness of views. It has felt the impetus of activity and business and wealth and prosperity.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It has got it largely from the rural free delivery that comes off this train.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; a great deal is due to free delivery, and I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the Southern people who know what benefit this fast mail has brought them will have but little patience with the public man who stands here in his place, and for some dreamy, shadowy, aesthetic views of the doctrine of equal rights to all and special favors to none or the tenets of a political party, withholds from his people an appropriation of vast benefit to them and for the public good. [Loud applause.] I say that time is now past in all parts of the South, and 'tis well for us that it is gone.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, I am surprised at the assaults that are made upon this appropriation. It is nothing but an appropriation. Gentlemen are mistaken when they say that it is a gift—a donation to the Southern Railroad. It, sir, is a donation to the people for their interests and for the public good. Why do these railroads desire to hold it? It is an advertisement for the Southern Railroad. It associates them with the power and the privileges of the Government. I have shown you the figures that show that this 97 train, that gives Alabama, Mississippi, Texas, and Louisiana all these great benefits, actually runs and earns less than any other regular train over this 7,000 miles of railroad. Trains stand at Atlanta and other points awaiting the arrival of train 97—the fast mail train—and at once leave in different directions carrying mail to the people at distant points fourteen to twenty hours earlier than they would otherwise get it. At Montgomery and Mobile the same thing occurs, and yet 'tis facetiously, yea, luridly, denounced a "subsidy," an octopus, robbing the Treasury. I say that I am surprised at gentlemen who indulge in such pyrotechnics.

The time was, not long since, when there was vociferous denunciation in the South of Federal aid in the way of internal improvements. But the South, Mr. Chairman, happily is passing away from those feelings and views. Where are the gentlemen who to-day will stand up here and denounce Federal aid of internal improvements? Here we come before you and ask you simply and plainly that out of a bill that carries $190,000,000 there be paid the sum of $142,000 to aid the people in disseminating useful knowledge and assisting the business men of that section.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman tell the committee how much it expedites the mail?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. It expedites it from twelve to twenty hours. Collaterally, it carries its benefits a hundred miles away from the trunk line, which is paid. It is of great advantage to towns a hundred miles from the main trunk line. Through free rural delivery this fast mail reaches thousands of the masses of the people and gives them the benefit of their papers and letters many hours in advance. Yet they say, "Oh, it is a subsidy; it is an octopus which is about to destroy and devour the people." I can see it, with its slimy tail and serpentine coil, as they describe it. They—the gentlemen who are so earnest in their opposition—declare with uplifted hands and writhing features that we are putting our unholy hands into the sacred precincts of the Treasury and robbing it, when we are simply asking these northern friends of ours to come to our aid and help us upon that which is absolutely a business proposition in every respect. [Applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] desire to use some of his time now?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, while we are in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and taking a broad view of the whole country, I think it is not inappropriate at this particular time to allude to the present status of the statehood bill for a moment. I shall not say now what I expect to say later on in that connection, but take the floor for the purpose of reading in this presence a poem written by an Arizona lady, touching the joint statehood bill. I think it is worthy the time of the House to hear it.

ARIZONA.

[By Sharlot M. Hall, of Dewey, Ariz.]

No beggar she in the mighty hall where her bay-crowned sisters wait,
No empty-handed pleader for the right of a free-born State;
No child, with a child's insistence, demanding a gilded toy,
But a fair-browed, queenly woman, strong to create or destroy;
Wise for the need of the sons she has bred in the school where weaklings fail,
Where cunning is less than manhood, and deeds, not words, avail;
With the high, unswerving purpose that measures and overcomes,
And the faith in the farthest vision that builded her hard-won homes.

Link her, in her clean-proved fitness, in her right to stand alone—
Secure for whatever future in the strength that her past has won—
Link her, in her morning beauty, with another, however fair?
And open your jealous portal and bid her enter there
With shackles on wrist and ankle, and dust on her stately head,
And her proud eyes dim with weeping? No! Bar your doors instead,
And seal them fast forever! but let her go her way—
Uncrowned if you will, but unshackled, to wait for a larger day.

Ay! Let her go barehanded, bound with no grudging gift,
Back to her own free spaces where her rock-ribbed mountains lift
Their walls like a sheltering fortress—back to her house and blood;
But we of her blood will go our way and reckon your judgment good.
We will wait outside your sullen door till the stars you wear grow dim
As the pale dawn stars that swim and fade o'er our mighty canyon's rim.
We will lift no hand for the bays ye wear, nor covet your robes of state—
But ah! by the skies above us all, we will shame ye while we wait!

We will make ye the mold of an empire here in the land ye scorn,
While ye drowse and dream in your well-housed ease that States at your nod are born.
Ye have blotted your own beginnings, and taught your sons to forget
That ye did not spring fat fed and old from the powers that bear and beget.
But the while ye follow your smooth-made roads to a fireside safe of fears
Shall come a voice from a land still young, to sing in your age-dulled ears
The hero song of a strife as fine as your fathers' fathers knew,
When they dared the rivers of unmapped wilds at the will of a bark canoe—

The song of the deed in the doing, of the work still hot from the hand;
Of the yoke of man laid friendlywise on the neck of a tameless land.
While your merchandise is weighing, we will bit and bridle and rein
The floods of the storm-rocked mountains and lead them down to the plain;
And the foam-ribbed, dark-hued waters, tired from that mighty race,
Shall lie at the feet of palm and vine and know their appointed place;
And out of that subtle union, desert and mountain flood,
Shall be homes for a nation's choosing, where no home else has stood.

We will match the gold of your minting, with its mint stamp dulled and marred
By the tears and blood that have stained it and the hands that have clutched too hard,
With the gold that no man has lied for—the gold no woman has made
The price of her truth and honor, plying a shameless trade—
The clean, pure gold of the mountains, straight from the strong, dark earth,
With no tang or taint upon it from the hour of its primal birth.
The trick of the money changer, shifting his coins as he wills,
Ye may keep—no Christ was bartered for the wealth of our lavish hills.

"Yet we are a little people—too weak for the cares of State!"
Let us go our way! When ye look again, ye shall find us, mayhap, too great.
Cities we lack—and gutters where children snatch for bread;
Numbers—and hordes of starvelings, toiling, but never fed.
Spare pains that would make us greater in the pattern that ye have set;
We hold to the larger measure of the men that ye forget—
The men who, from trackless forests and prairies, lone and far,
Hewed out the land where ye sit at ease and grudge us our fair-won star.

"There yet be men, my masters," though the net that the trickster flings
Lies wide on the land to its bitter shame, and his cunning parleyings
Have deafened the ears of Justice that was blind and slow of old.
Yet time, the last Great Judge, is not bought, or bribed, or sold;
And Time and the Race shall judge us—not a league of trafficking men,
Selling the trust of the people, to barter it back again;
Palming the lives of millions as a handful of easy coin,
With a single heart to the narrow verge where craft and statecraft join.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, in some remarks I made yesterday on a bill before the House pertaining to the District of Columbia I quoted what I then had before me from an address delivered by the Hon. Henry B. F. Macfarland before the Buffalo Exposition and also a quotation from an article in Everybody's Magazine. The quotation that I gave was one that I took from a publication that I had, and I gave it in full as far as I had it, but it was not all that he said on the subject, and he has called my attention to the fact that the partial quotation was not entirely just to him. He has sent me his address in full before the Buffalo Exposition, and I include same as part of my remarks. It is a splendid presentation of the Commissioner's view of the present form of the government of the District of Columbia, and I ask every Member of the House to read same carefully.

Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to be understood as criticising the Commissioners. I said once before in the House when discussing the present form of government that if I was asked to name three gentlemen for Commissioners I should name the three gentlemen who now hold those positions. My complaint is with the form of government and not with the Commissioners. The difficulties I complain of are inherent, and not the result of the present administration. I am unconditionally for home rule for the District of Columbia, and under the present form of government it can not be had; therefore I am in favor of such a change as will give the people of this District complete control of local municipal affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the speech which he indicates. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The speech is as follows:

"THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA."

The capital of the United States of America brings greeting to-day to the Pan-American Exposition of the first year of the twentieth century. The District of Columbia, home of the United States Government, seated in the city planned by Washington, and which bears his name, offers its congratulations to the managers of this exposition, and to the men and women of Buffalo who made it possible, upon the success which they have achieved. Congratulations have come, or will come, from every State in the Union, from every one of our sister republics, and from the Dominion of Canada, but none, we flatter ourselves, can be more significant than those which come from the official heart of the United States of America, where the feelings of all the people of our Union are gathered up and expressed together. The District of Columbia is highly honored in having this day set apart by the exposition for its benefit, but it can make some return in delivering to the exposition the essence of the good will and felicitations of our country. Indeed, as the oldest republican capital on this continent, it may, without presumption, claim the honor to speak at least for all its younger relatives, the capitals of the republics south of us, including the youngest republic of this hemisphere, Cuba, which comes into independence with the opening of the twentieth century. George Washington was the example of the heroes who liberated and founded those republics, and they naturally looked, and looked not in vain, to the capital which he founded for that sympathy and support which they could not hope for in any other capital the great world round. In the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, they found what they had a right to expect—recognition and consideration, without condescension or intimidation, courtesy as disinterested as is ever found among men. They misread history who see in the dealings of the United States of America with the other republics of this hemisphere anything inconsistent with the character of the elder brother. From the time that they established their independence the earlier republics had the friendship of the earliest republic, and it has been almost always generously shown in considerate ways.

It was in the District of Columbia that John Quincy Adams, following out George Washington's thought, formulated the principle which President Monroe announced, and to which his name was given. It has never been invoked except for the benefit of this continent, and it will never be employed for the wanton injury of any power beyond the seas, much less to the damage of any country between the Atlantic and Pacific. It is a doctrine of peace and not of war, except as war may sometimes be necessary to gain peace and it can never be rightfully used except on this basis. To keep the peace of this continent has always been a desire of our country.

It was in the District of Columbia that John Quincy Adams and Henry Clay, in eloquent language, first set forth the noble principles of the relations which the United States desired with the new-born republics, in their efforts to secure representation of the United States at the first Congress of American Republics at Panama—efforts which, though injured by partisan opposition, were crowned with success, although it came too late to be of practical importance. It was in the District of Columbia that, after the lapse of more than half a century, another Congress of American Republics, greater than that of Panama, as the republics themselves had become greater, met, upon the invitation of the United States of America, and drew together the States of North and South America in closer ties than they had ever known before. It was at the opening of that congress, the precursor of this exposition and of the congress which is about to meet in the City of Mexico, that Secretary Blaine expressed the deep thought of the American people when he said:

"We believe that hearty cooperation, based on hearty confidence, will save all American states from the burdens and evils which have long and cruelly afflicted the older nations of the world.

"We believe that a spirit of justice, of common and equal interest between the American states, will leave no room for an artificial balance of power like unto that which has led to wars abroad and drenched Europe in blood.

"We believe that friendship, avowed with candor and maintained with good faith, will remove from American states the necessity of guarding boundary lines between themselves with fortifications and military force.

"We believe that standing armies, beyond those which are needful for public order and the safety of internal administration, should be unknown on both American continents.

"We believe that friendship and not force, the spirit of just law and not the violence of the mob, should be the recognized rule of administration between American nations and in American nations."

Arbitration as a means of preventing war has been prominent in the gospel of our country, and it was with peculiar satisfaction that we heard Secretary Blaine say, in closing the Pan-American Congress of 1889, in Washington:

"If, in this closing hour, the conference had but one deed to celebrate, we should dare call the world's attention to the deliberate, confident, solemn dedication of two great continents to peace and to the prosperity which has peace for its foundation. We hold up this new Magna Charta which abolishes war and substitutes arbitration between the American republics as the first and great fruit of the International American Conference. That noblest of Americans, the aged poet and philanthropist, Whittier, is the first to send his salutation and his benediction, declaring:

"'If, in the spirit of peace, the American conference agrees upon a rule of arbitration which shall make war in this hemisphere well-nigh impossible, its sessions will prove one of the most important events in the history of the world.'"

The District of Columbia has been the scene of many other efforts and negotiations having the same objects as the Pan-American Congress of 1889.

It has also been the scene of many efforts and negotiations, in part successful, intended to secure closer and more cordial relations between the United States and our great neighbor on the north, who must be included, as here, in any real Pan-American project. In spite of all that selfish politicians, prompted by no less selfish business men, have done to keep the United States and the Dominion of Canada apart, they have inevitably, under natural laws that can not be affected by treaties or enactments, been brought closer together in personal and commercial intercourse, which now makes the very thought of war between them seem, even here, near the battle grounds of the war of 1812, incredible if not impossible. It was the treaty of Washington, preeminently entitled to that name, which, providing for the greatest arbitration of history between two of the greatest nations of history, proclaimed the international principles of the United States and removed the last real danger of war with Great Britain which we shall ever see.

Peace on earth among men of good will, peace with honor, though not peace at any price—this is and has always been the choice of the American people, who do not love war for war's sake, and who do not thirst for its conquests or its glories. That brotherhood of men which is only possible because of the fatherhood of God is dear to them. That friendliness for all other nations, without entangling alliances with any of them, which George Washington preached, has been the heart of the people's desire ever since, even when the war spirit rose high or when actual war was on. Nothing is further from the truth than any representation of the United States as an Uncle Sam going around with a chip on his shoulder, making faces at foreigners and breathing out threatenings against them. On the contrary, the disposition of the United States is to endure patiently as long as possible whatever wrongs may be put upon it, and to seek a remedy by peaceful means. And it is less and less disposed to brag and bluster as it attains greater power and therefore greater self-respect. This very exposition, like those which have preceded it, manifests the spirit of the American people, devoted to the competitions of peace. Proud of its Army and Navy, proud of their achievements and those of the citizen soldiery supplementing the regular forces, it looks upon them as a means of defense and not of offense, and for the exceptional emergencies and not the ordinary life of the nation.

Nowhere is the national or the international feeling of the United States of America so strong or so clearly expressed as in the District of Columbia, where the representatives and the citizens of all the States and Territories meet and contribute to the population; where the National Government carries on its operations; where the President, through the Secretary of State, conducts the negotiations respecting its foreign relations with the ambassadors and ministers of all the other governments who are permanently resident in Washington. The very purpose of the founders of the District of Columbia was to make it national, and even cosmopolitan—removed from local and provincial feelings and influences—and its development has more and more gratified their desire.

It will be remembered that the far-seeing genius of George Washington first perceived the necessity for such a capital. He had seen the Revolutionary capital and that of the Confederation which followed the Revolution moving about from place to place in ephemeral and undignified fashion; he had seen the Congress of the Confederation flee from its place in Philadelphia in 1783 before the onslaught of a mob of the ill-requited soldiers of the Revolution. He had determined then that the people of the United States needed not only a more perfect union, but a more perfect capital in a Federal district, which would give it security and sanctity it could not have in any place temporarily loaned by one of the States. Other men began to see it, too. It was felt that the dignity as well as the safety and therefore the perpetuity of the National Government that was to come into being with the new Constitution demanded that it should have a seat of its own, under it own authority, and where it could not be encroached upon by any disturbing influences. Accordingly, in the Constitution of 1789 provision was made for a Federal district 10 miles square, over which Congress should have exclusive jurisdiction. Then came the consideration in Congress of the important question of where the Federal district should be placed. Naturally, different sections and different States desired it. It was seen that it could not be given to New England or to the extreme South, but every State in between considered itself eligible, and most of them tried to get it, offering in some cases even their State capitals for the national use. The contest in Congress over the selection of a place became excited and at times so bitter that some felt that the break-up of the Union, which all feared as possible before its thin ties could be made unbreakable, might come over the placing of the Federal district. Congress made several tentative selections and one, in Pennsylvania, that was apparently definitive, but all were reconsidered, and it seemed as though the controversy might go on indefinitely when the famous compromise was reached by which the South got the Federal district, in consideration of its acquiescence in the desire of the North for the assumption by the nation of the Revolutionary debts of the States. It was as natural as it was admirable that the choice of the precise location for the Federal district on the Potomac River, for 100 miles from Williamsport southward, was left to George Washington, who knew the whole region thoroughly and was more interested in the success of the plan than any other man, for he had not only the eye of the surveyor but the eye of the seer, and selected a site only with regard to its beauty, its convenience, and its adaptability, but to the future of the nation. It was well that he was also intrusted with the preparation of the Federal city within the Federal district, for he laid it out, with the assistance of Thomas Jefferson, the leader of the other school of statesmen, and of the surveyors, L'Enfant and Ellicott, with the eye of faith which saw the United States of to-day as no other man of his time began to see it.

It is hard to realize now that no one saw then as Washington did the United States of a century later, bound together in a Union that can not be broken, a mighty nation, spread not only across the continent but across the seas, and whose future greatness no man can limit. Washington thought with breadth and depth that distinguished him from the other fathers of this Republic, and nowhere does this appear more clearly than on the map of the Federal city, as Washington called it, although inevitably it was called by his name by everyone else, and finally by Congress. As we look at that plan, whose scope and detail are now admired by the greatest experts as the best possible for the purpose, we see Washington's confidence in the future of the nation which he had brought into the world. It is difficult for us to realize how puny that nation appeared to foreigners; how weak and unpromising to many of its own citizens; so that the magnificent project of Washington for the Federal city seemed to them, alike in its unparalleled grandeur and symmetry, a thing for ridicule. The serene Washington, who faced laughter as he faced cannon, did not change his project, which is still the working plan for the city of Washington to this day. Washington not only selected the site of the Federal district and planned the Federal city, but he also directed the arrangements under which Maryland and Virginia gave to the United States the jurisdiction over the territory for the District of Columbia, as Congress called the Federal district in memory of Columbus, and personally conducted the negotiations with the nineteen owners of the land, mostly cut up into farms, on which the city of Washington was to be built. He included on the Maryland side of the Potomac, in the larger portion of the District, 69 out of the 100 square miles, the city of Georgetown, founded by Scotch and English in 1751, and on the Virginia side of the Potomac his own home town of Alexandria, both towns then ambitious and hopeful of commercial greatness, which Washington himself sought to bring to them by the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, designed to connect the East with the country beyond the mountains, then called the West. But the Federal city he placed on the map between Rock Creek, the eastern boundary of Georgetown, on the west, and the Anacostia River on the east, with the Potomac as the southern boundary. The National Government was poor as well as weak. It could not afford to buy out the original proprietors. It could not afford to put up the necessary buildings for its own use. Therefore, in the decade from 1790 to 1800, given to Washington for the preparation of the national capital, he had to arrange with the owners to make them stockholders, in a sense, in the national city, by securing their donations of more than half of the land to the National Government, in consideration of the enhanced value which would accrue to the land which they kept. Then, with ample reservations of land for avenues, streets, and parks, some of the rest was sold on the Government account as building lots to raise funds for buildings in connection with appropriations of money made by Maryland and Virginia. Washington, who in this formative period had to overcome many difficulties, at last, just before his untimely death in 1799, saw his work so well done that it could not be undone, and derived from it a pleasure which nothing else except his successes in the Revolution and in the adoption of the Constitution had yielded to him.

But although the Federal district had been established and the Federal city had been laid out on paper, the general appearance of the farms that stretched from the low hills in the north of the District down to the fishing hamlets on the shore of the Potomac, showed very little change when, in 1800, the National Government slowly removed from Philadelphia to Washington. The Executive Mansion, which was of the same size, but not of the same color as to-day, and the old Capitol building, one-third the size of that of to-day, were the only important new structures, although buildings for the small Executive Departments of that time had been constructed and a number of dwelling houses, with a few small hotels and boarding houses. Pennsylvania avenue was rather plainly marked as a road between the Capitol and the Executive Mansion, and a few other avenues and streets in the southern and central portion of the young city were traced through the groves and pastures in a similar way.

The population of Washington in the year 1800, when the National Government had become established in it, was less than 4,000, Georgetown having less than 3,000, Alexandria nearly 5,000, while there were nearly 3,000 in the rest of the District. The total population of the District was 14,093, including 2,072 slaves.

The National Government was a small body of men, and its business was comparatively small in amount. The nation itself was felt to be still an experiment, and it was not regarded as certain that there would continue to be a National Government or a national capital. Chief Justice Marshall, however, took his seat on the Supreme Bench in February, 1801, and began, in that masterly series of decisions, to draw out of the new Constitution the powers for a mighty National Government, which could never be broken except by revolution. While that great statesman in the robes of a jurist was thus carrying George Washington's ideas into practical and permanent effect, the National Government continued to be so poor that it was not able to build up and improve the Federal city as Washington had intended. And even as the nation grew in wealth and power, and larger measures of both came to the National Government, it continued to leave the improvement of the city of Washington, and all the rest of the District of Columbia, practically to the people who lived in it. For seventy years Congress did not give the District of Columbia even a form of government, although Washington was given what Georgetown and Alexandria had of municipal government by mayor and councils. In that time Congress spent $90,000,000 in constructing buildings and other conveniences for the business of the Government in the District of Columbia, but, with what seems like neglect of the interests of the capital, it left the burden of general improvements and the maintenance of the local governments largely to the inhabitants of the District. It was not, perhaps, intentional neglect. It was undoubtedly caused at first by the comparative poverty of the National Government, and afterwards the very conditions resulting prevented that pride and interest which ought to have been taken in the national capital.

Then, too, it was not until after the civil war that it was finally settled that the national capital would not be moved from the District of Columbia. It had hardly been established there before agitation for its removal began; first, on the part of those who were dissatisfied with it as a place of residence, and, afterwards, by those who desired for other places the honor and advantage of having the national capital. As the expansion of the country, begun by Washington and Jefferson, proceeded westward over the Alleghenies and beyond the Mississippi, and it became apparent that it might go on until the Pacific was reached, the men of the West began to murmur because the national capital was on the eastern edge of the continent, and communication with it was slow and difficult. The railroad and the telegraph were removing the only substantial reason for a change, when the civil war made a change impossible by hallowing the District of Columbia with the sentiments of sacrifice and glory. It had not been improved as Washington desired. The city of Washington had not been made beautiful. It was still unkempt and neglected in its general aspects, but great armies of the best and bravest of the North and South had fought to possess it, and many thousands of them had poured out their life-blood for it. The hundreds of thousands of men who marched through it to the battlefields all around it felt a new interest in it, and those who survived and returned to their homes all over the Union communicated that interest to their relatives and friends.

In these days of travel it is hard to realize how few Americans had visited Washington before the war, and therefore how dim and shadowy the national capital seemed to the people of the country. But the national capital, like the National Government, became intensely real and intensely precious to the men and women whose dear ones went to battle for it, and after the success of the Union armies had given a new meaning to both the Government and the capital the suggestion of giving the Government a new home met only with ridicule. The greatest captain of the war, the general of the triumphant armies, shared the new interest in the old capital, for which he had probably cared very little, like most of his fellow-citizens, before the war. When General Grant became President of the United States in 1869, he came into close official relations with the District of Columbia, and it was easy for the leader of its more progressive citizens, a remarkable man whose vigor and ability impressed General Grant, to enlist his support for an effort to carry into effect the long-neglected plans of George Washington for the District of Columbia. Fortunately for the District, its natural leader and the large majority of both Houses of Congress were of the same political party as the President of the United States, and that party, which also controlled the Supreme Court, still had the confidence of the majority of the people as the savior of the Union. This made it possible to do in a very short time remarkable work for the betterment of the District of Columbia. First of all, it was given a government. Congress, under the Constitution, had legislated for it in a haphazard way for the most part, although it had given it a judicial system at the beginning of the century and a metropolitan police system at the beginning of the civil war. But in 1871 it gave the District a territorial form of government, with a governor, appointed by the President, and a legislature and a delegate in Congress, elected by the people, who still retained the right of suffrage which they had formerly exercised in voting for the municipal officers of the cities in the District. Alexandria had been lost to the District when Virginia took back, in 1846, the strip of territory which it had donated on the south side of the Potomac, and in 1871 the cities of Washington and Georgetown gave up their municipal governments, and from that time on they have had no other government than that of the District of Columbia, so that the city of Washington, which now comprehends also the former city of Georgetown, is the only city in the world which has no government of its own.

The government of the District of Columbia, controlled by the one masterful spirit, proceeded to improve the city of Washington by opening up, grading, and paving avenues and streets all over it according to Washington's plan. The valleys were filled up with the hills. The work was done on a grand scale, and all over the city at once, so that when it had once been begun it was easier to go on and finish it than to try to undo it. Suddenly and generally the plowshare of progress was driven roughly but skillfully in all sections of the city. Naturally there was bitter and ardent protest from property owners who preferred the old conditions to the increased taxation of the new. But for the time being the new force at work was irresistible, and before it could be checked it had started the new Washington and had made it impossible to go backwards. All that the reactionary forces could do, aided by a political change in Congress and the panic of 1873, was to halt the march of improvement and change the form of government.

Although the charges of corruption and thievery, which were so freely made, were not established in the Congressional investigation that followed, and though the general results of what was done under the Territorial government were accepted as on the whole beneficial, although it took years to make some see it, the taxpayers of the District generally were satisfied by their experiences that they wanted no more of the electoral franchise under the apparently unchangeable condition of universal manhood suffrage, and therefore they induced Congress, in 1874, to provide for the government of the District without suffrage by a temporary board of three Commissioners, which was to prepare the way for a permanent government by Commissioners. At the same time Congress was brought to acknowledge for the first time its financial obligations to the District of Columbia in view of the fact that the title to more than one-half of the real estate was in the United States, and the National Government was receiving the full benefit of all municipal services. Congress promised that, under the new government by Commissioners, it would pay half the expenses of the District, the other half to be paid by the citizens who had theretofore borne the whole burden. Congress also, in consideration of the authority it had given the Territorial government to borrow money for the extraordinary expenses of improvement, gave the guaranty of the United States for the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds issued on that account. In fulfillment of its promises, Congress, in 1878, passed the act which the Supreme Court of the United States has termed "the constitution of the District of Columbia," giving it a permanent government by three Commissioners, to be appointed by the President of the United States, who exercise all the executive power and to whom is also delegated a certain legislative authority to make regulations enforcible by penalties for the public safety, health, and comfort—a unique grant to an executive government. In the same act runs the provision for the division of the expenses of the District of Columbia half and half between the United States and the District of Columbia. Twenty-three years' experience has proved that this is the ideal form of government for the District of Columbia. This is attested by the fact that there is no probability that it will be materially changed at any time in the future. The fact that it is an exception to all other governments in the United States in that it provides for taxation without representation, and is autocratic in form, grieves some good people in the District who care more for sentiment than for substance, and grieves others who would like to take advantage of the untoward conditions which the restoration of the suffrage would inevitably produce. But the people of the District of Columbia generally believe that they have the best form of government possible for them, and if any serious attempt were made to change it, it would be overwhelmingly defeated. They know that the absence of partisan politics in the District of Columbia has made its government purely a matter of business, and that it has been carried on with absolute honesty, with conspicuous efficiency and economy, and in accordance with its official motto, "Justitia omnibus." There has been no suspicion of maladministration, of corruption, or of blackmail. The Commissioners and the other officers of the government of the District of Columbia invariably have had the confidence and support of all that is best in the community. Under the organic act of 1878, two of the Commissioners are to be residents of the District of Columbia, and the third is to be an officer of high rank in the Army Corps of Engineers, the civilians serving for three years, the engineer commissioner having no fixed term, but, as a rule, serving for a shorter period. Under the unwritten law of custom, the President always chooses the civilians from different political parties, and one of them has always been a lawyer, though the law requires only that they shall be residents of the District. Their recommendations of legislation and appropriations are the basis for the annual action of Congress, and Congress, through its committees, consults the Commissioners about all measures affecting the District, and commonly follows the advice of the Commissioners. The annual budget of the Commissioners amounts now, in round numbers, to about $9,000,000, which has to be appropriated in detail by Congress, half from the National Treasury, half from the District revenues, and all the accounts of the District, because of the national participation, are audited not only by the auditor of the District, but by the United States Treasury Department. Accounts that pass such scrutiny could not long be dishonest, even if there were dishonest men in the government of the District.

This unique government would not have been continued and would not have been succesful had it not been in fact more responsive to public opinion than any other in North or South America. Self-government of the most direct and effective character is the possession of the people of the District of Columbia. The President has always chosen as Commissioners men whose character and abilities gave them the support of their fellow-citizens, and the Commissioners and Congress have always welcomed every expression of the public will. The government of the District of Columbia is therefore admittedly the best in the United States, because it is a government by the best citizens, with partisan politics, the professional politician, and the municipal jobber absolutely eliminated. The District of Columbia desires to exhibit at the Pan-American Exposition its form of government as its best and most characteristic product, which can not be duplicated for honesty and efficiency. Under this government it is becoming the most beautiful capital in the world and has doubled its population and wealth.

In the celebration, on the 12th of last December, of the centennial anniversary of the founding of the District of Columbia the speeches at the Executive Mansion and at the Capitol showed that the District of Columbia had held its own in the progress of the nineteenth century. It had not become the "commercial emporium" of the first order for which George Washington hoped, any more than it had become the home of the national university of which he dreamed and for which he made a large bequest. Yet it has an economic and commercial development which surprises even its own inhabitants with every census, and it has room and special facilities, without endangering the peculiar advantages of Washington as a residence city, for the large expansion of manufacturing enterprises, while it has become a university center with 2,500 collegiate students, and, besides its colleges, posseses those great mines for scientific research, the Government libraries and collections with a million volumes and thousands of scientific treasures, which are now to be made more accessible than ever to the graduate student.

But the distinction of the District of Columbia lies in the fact that it is more than a commercial or a collegiate center—more, even, than a place of scientific research. It is the national capital, the home of the National Government, the official residence of the President, his Cabinet, the Supreme Court, the Congress, and the ambassadors and ministers of all the other governments of the world accredited to the United States. This is, and ought to be, and always will be, its distinctive glory. It had this at its beginning a hundred years ago, when President John Adams announced formally to Congress the transfer of the seat of government to its borders. Even then it had that fine society, which it has always had since, and that noble life, full of interest and culture, of high pursuits and great affairs. It has not the most polyglot population, but it has the most cosmopolitan interests in the United States. All the Presidents except George Washington, and all their Cabinet officers, all the Chief Justices from John Marshall down, and all their associates in the Supreme Court, all the Vice-Presidents since Jefferson, all the Senators and all the Representatives since the Fifth Congress, all the ambassadors and ministers of foreign governments since 1800, all the great officers of the Army and Navy, and many of our most eminent scientists have been residents of the District of Columbia and have contributed to its society, always distinguished for its refinement and culture, not only the honor of their presence, but the riches of their minds. More important still, the public men have done their great deeds and spoken their great words, making in large measure the history of our country, in the District of Columbia. Simply to recall the names of men whose biographies are that history will give you a true conception of the wealth and greatness of the District of Columbia, which claims them, their speeches and their actions at their best as its own. Each of them is claimed by some State, possibly as it proudest boast, but all of them belong to the District of Columbia, where they lived out their greatness in word and in deed.

The intelligent American, visiting Washington for the first time, sees not only that it is beautiful for situation and beautiful in itself, with its splendid avenues and streets, its parks and trees, its noble buildings and handsome residences, but that it is majestic and impressive in its memories and associations. He sees it peopled with our leaders in the century whose progress this exposition celebrates. In the Executive Mansion, in the Capitol, on Pennsylvania avenue, he walks in the footprints of the greatest men we have known, and he sees at every turn reminders of their lives and their work. The Washington Monument, towering above all similar structures in the world, is a symbol not only of the great and pure founder's life, but of the life of the city which he founded, in its greatness and simplicity, in its high aspirations and in its separation from mercenary considerations. We need no Westminster Abbey while we have Washington to preserve to us that which can not be wrought into marble or bronze, the very spirit of the best that was in our statesmen and heroes, and in performing this high office it rises in simple grandeur above the marts of the money makers and the gatherings of the factories.

From the windows of the Washington Monument, 500 feet above the ground, and almost in the center of the original District of Columbia, one can survey almost its entire extent without a glass. It is a small State, though not so small as Athens or as Rome. It is smaller than any other political division of the United States, although it has more population than six of the States—Delaware, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, Utah, and Nevada—and than any of the Territories. It is not rich in money, as riches go to-day, though it is not poor, as riches went but yesterday. But it is wealthy in the common wealth of greatness, intellectual and spiritual, in good government, good society, outward beauty and inward grace, noble men and noble memories, and a glorious history. It stands supreme, far above the terrible waves of materialism, for intellectual and spiritual achievement, for high thinking and fine living, and for those ambitions which can not be satisfied with sordid gains or sensuous pleasures. Its voice sounds even above the clamor of the market places to remind us of men who were too busy to make money and too patriotic to seek selfish ends, and who gave to their country what other men gave to themselves. It tells the youth of the country that there is something better than selfishness, and summons them with the irresistible call of duty to the unselfish life of patriotic endeavor.

From the calm height of the Washington Monument men and things below appear in proper proportion; they are seen through the distance of space, as through the distance of time, and with the serene eye of history. True and relative values appear. We see, too, how out of all the wrongs and all the difficulties and all the dangers of the past, even through the mighty agonies of the civil war, the nation has been led constantly into a larger place and to better things.

Looking westward, up the beautiful reaches of the Potomac, curving toward the sunset, we remember that George Washington rode there, looking with the eye of the first great American expansionist beyond the horizon, beyond the Blue Ridge and the Alleghenies, to that promised land which he sought to have us occupy, and we remember how, step by step, in spite of all obstacles and all discouragement and all defeats, the idea of Washington has been carried out until his principles, represented by his flag, have been spread over the islands of the sea in the uttermost parts of the earth, far beyond his farthest dream. As we look to the southward, toward Mount Vernon, where he lived and died, and yet still lives, we think how his ideal of republican freedom, his example as a Revolutionary patriot, brought a score of republics into being south of us, and how his teachings made the United States the protector and the friend of every one of them, without making the United States the enemy of any other country. Then, when we turn to the eastern windows, looking out to the hills beyond which lies the Atlantic Ocean we see the influence of Washington and his example in the Republic of France, in the republican aspirations of other European countries, in the democracy which is the real government of Great Britain. We see his doctrine of peace keeping by arbitration, first set forth in treaty form under his direction by John Jay in the famous treaty with England, then denounced and since admired, enthroned at The Hague by all the world, and we see that his humane and enlightened maxims of government, national and international, once innovations are now commonplaces. Pessimism seems out of place, optimism seems natural, as we reflect in the city of Washington upon the achievements of the nation of Washington under the principles of Washington. Clouds cover the zenith, rain even falls from their darkness, but the sun, shining over Arlington, where lie men who died that the Republic might live, arches the Capitol with a glorious rainbow, beautiful reminder of the covenant of God with his people.

So, as we stand here in this "Rainbow City," looking out over our country and the world, facing the new occasions which have brought new duties, frankly admitting that with unsolved problems at home we must solve even great problems abroad, realizing that we have been brought with the suddenness and completeness of Providence into leadership among the nations, with all the responsibility and all the peril, as well as all the privileges and opportunities that it involves, we shall not be cowards who falter. We will not blink our shortcomings, our difficulties, or our dangers, but we will remember the wonderful way in which we have been brought through greater trials and tribulations and the good which we have been enabled to do for ourselves and for all mankind, even in the recent past—in China as in the dominions of the sea. We do not shut our eyes to the clouds and darkness over us or even to the rain falling upon us, but we see shining through it the rays of the sun of righteousness; we see beyond it the rainbow of the promises of God. We hear His voice saying to us, "Only do right, be strong and of good courage, go forward in the way of my commandment." We are persuaded that if we obey, in spite of everything that may oppose us, in spite of our own faintness and faults, we shall come off conquerors and more than conquerors through Him that hath loved us.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago * * * occupied the floor of this House for more than an hour in an apparent effort to answer a speech previously made by me on the subject of restrictive immigration. So far did the gentleman fail to present any argument either to sustain his own position or refute the one taken by myself, that not one single line or sentence of his speech can be construed as casting any light on this important subject. If the gentleman had been a professional pilot, he could not have more successfully steered around every point at issue, and if it were not for the fact of glaringly false statements made by him reflecting on the intelligence of my people and on the honor and integrity of the courts of my State, I would not dignify his effort with a reply.

But there is method in my friend's madness. From a trustworthy source in this city I am advised that one-half of the men engaged in marine immigration transportation living in the whole city are in his district. Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts said the other day that our greatest obstacle in passing a restriction bill would come from the ship companies, who would die in the last ditch rather than have the magnificent profits they are now making out of transporting immigrants both ways across the ocean curtailed. * * * who had been brought to New York by one of the steamship companies, but was refused admission and ordered to be deported more than two weeks ago.

Section 2 of the act of March 3, 1903, provides that no idiot, pauper, or person likely to become a public charge, shall be admitted.

Section 11 provides that the master or owner of the vessel bringing such person shall transport them together with an attendant back to the country from which they were brought.

Section 13 provides that the commanding officer of each vessel bringing immigrants shall take an oath before an immigration officer at the port of entry to the effect that he has caused the surgeon of the vessel to make a physical and oral examination of each of said aliens, and that from the report of said surgeon and that from his own investigations he believes that no one of said aliens is an idiot, a pauper, or likely to become a public charge. This unfortunate woman is such a pronounced blank that Commissioner-General Sargent told me that the sores on her legs showed she had been manacled; that she shrank from the light, indicating that she had been kept in darkness, and that she did not eat with her hands, but thrust her mouth into her plate to eat. * * * Now, who is the beneficiary of this resolution? It is not the poor unfortunate idiot, who will have to be placed in an asylum wherever she goes. No; it is the ship company, who will have to transport her and an attendant back to Europe at their own cost. And it is the master of the ship, who brought her in violation of the law, and has the crime of her perjury hanging over his head for swearing that she was not an idiot, a pauper, or likely to become a public charge.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Kentucky yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from New York for a question?

Mr. HOPKINS. I have only thirty minutes, and must decline to yield.

* * * * * * *

In giving the reasons why he was opposed to the bill fixing a $5 head tax, was because, he said: "It is paid by the steamship companies." He then says:

If there ever was a bill that should have been labeled "A gift to foreign steamship companies," it is that bill. Who pays this head tax? The law says it is a lien on the steamship, and the steamship company pays it. How does it pay it? Why, of course, in the end the money does not come out of the funds of the steamship company, but it is put on the ticket, and there is but one price for tickets.

In one breath the gentleman tells us the steamship company pays the head tax; in the next breath he tells us that they do not, that they add it to the price of a ticket and the immigrant pays it. Then he says the bill should be labeled "For the benefit of foreign steamship companies." Now, let me sum up just for one minute and show you how this bill will hurt them. My friend says there is but one price on tickets now, and that it includes the present head tax of $2. When the tax is increased to $5 the ship companies will either have to raise their passage $3 or lose $3 on each passenger. Of course they will not lose the $3, which would have aggregated more than $3,000,000 last year. But they will add it to the price of every ticket, which will to some extent lessen the number of tickets sold and thereby curtail their profits; and these are the true reasons why they are exerting their influence to defeat this bill. I give my friend credit for making one important admission, but I won't say he did it intentionally. He says:

We want to keep out the man who comes only for a few months' stay to earn money and return home with it, and that a head tax will not affect him at all, that it simply means that he will have to make arrangements not only to get the money to pay his fare across the ocean, but to pay the additional $3, which will be deducted from his first week's or month's earnings.

Can anything be stronger than this admission that people are being brought here in violation of the contract-labor law?

* * * he pretends to find fault with me for making an insinuation against the people of the great city of New York, which I deny doing. On the contrary, I, like every other patriotic citizen, should be proud of this great metropolis of our country, filled, as it is, with its hundreds of thousands of devoted, loyal, and patriotic citizens, who daily contribute their unselfish aid to the widening and extending of her field of usefulness. But, like every other community, either large or small, she has her bad men, her dark side, her trials, and her troubles. Many of these I can justly refer to, because they are, in my judgment the offspring of the very evil against which I spoke, and the result of our foreign immigration, while others I will refer to have no such connection and had better be left unsaid, and would be if I did not think it necessary to expose and show up the effort of the gentleman in its true light.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's labored effort reminds me of the Missouri negro's speech made in the campaign last fall. Being a Democrat myself, I have a right to repeat the story. The old darky was speaking away as hard as he could, and when he came to refer to the Democratic platform he raised his voice and shouted: "Fellow-citizens, the Dimmercratic platform is like a Mother Hubbard, it kivers everything and touches nary a pint." Now, that is like the gentleman's speech, long enough and loose enough to cover everything, but touches not a single point. [Laughter and applause.]

He says that 30.6 per cent of the voters of the country in which I live can neither read nor write, which is not true.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I demand that the gentleman's words be taken down.

The CHAIRMAN. The Official Reporter will report the words used by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. My point is that if the gentleman from New York had any objection to any remarks used by the gentleman from Kentucky he should have made his objection at the time as to the remarks just immediately preceding.

The CHAIRMAN. The words must be taken down at the time. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, can this kind of proceeding take place in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. The words can be asked to be taken down in Committee of the Whole House. That is part of the general debate.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, is it in order, the gentleman from Kentucky having lost his place on the floor, for another gentleman to take his place until this question is decided?

The CHAIRMAN. No; it is not. The Reporter informs the Chair that he has not been taking down the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky for the reason that the gentleman from Kentucky informed him that his remarks were in manuscript and that there was no need of reporting them. If the gentleman from Kentucky will permit the Chair to see the manuscript, the question can be determined.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Missouri in a moment. The clause to which the attention of the Chair has been called does not present any language that is out of order. The Chair was not listening to the gentleman from Kentucky, and does not know what were the exact words used, but this section to which his attention has been called as being the words is not out of order.

Mr. PAYNE. Will it be in order for the gentleman from New York to state the words as he understood them?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Kentucky was reading from his manuscript, and if this is the clause which the gentleman read to which the attention of the Chair has been called, it is not out of order.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement as to what the gentleman did say.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Oh, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not a question of unanimous consent, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] raises the question that the language presented to the Chair is not the language that was used and to which he objected.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the words should be reported to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is attempting to ascertain what the words actually used were to which the gentleman from New York objected.

Mr. PAYNE. Then let them be reported to the committee, and then the gentleman from New York can raise the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the words to which the attention of the Chair has been called.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's labored effort reminds me of the Missouri negro's speech made in the campaign last fall. Being a Democrat myself, I have a right to repeat the story. The old darky was speaking away as fast as he could, and when he came to refer to the Democratic platform he raised his voice and shouted: "Fellow-citizens, the Democratic platform is like a Mother Hubbard, it kivers everything and touches nary a pint." Now, that is like the gentleman's speech, long enough and loose enough to cover everything, but touches not a single point.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I certainly would not have objected to any such statement as that, and that was not the language that was being used at the time I objected.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, if the language was taken down by the stenographer we would accept it, but the gentleman from New York says that that is not the language to which he objected at all, and therefore we are entitled to ascertain in the best way we can, which is by the testimony of those who heard it. The stenographer was not acting officially at all. He does not pretend to have been taking down the speech, as the gentleman was reading it, and we are put at the mercy of the gentleman who had the floor when he says that those are the exact words, and I think we are entitled to have other testimony. We have not heard from the gentleman who was making the speech, and he does not say that that was his language and the sole language used at the time.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. OVERSTREET. In the event that the stenographer should report the wrong language to which objection has been made, is there any way by which the correct language could be ascertained?

The CHAIRMAN. It is proper for the committee to ascertain whether or not the report of the stenographer is correct.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Would it be in order for any Member who happened to be listening, and feels he knows what the language was, to state to the committee what it was to which objection was made?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That clearly could not be——

Mr. OVERSTREET. I would like to have my question answered by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thought he answered the parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman will state it again.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I asked if some one who happened to be giving attention at the time the point was made, and heard the language used to which objection was made, could make any statement relative to what it was?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the matter can be gotten at from the report, if the gentleman from Kentucky will give the Chair his attention for one moment. The sentence immediately following that indicated by the stenographer is apparently the sentence to which the gentleman from New York objected, and the probabilities are that the gentleman from Kentucky had read one more sentence than the stenographer indicated to the Chair he had read. Now, can the gentleman from Kentucky tell the Chair whether that is so or not?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not know to what sentence the Chair alludes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will read the next sentence [reading]:

He says—

Referring to the gentleman from New York—

that 30.6 per cent of the voters of the country in which I live can neither read nor write, which is not true.

Had the gentleman given utterance to that statement?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir; and I stand by it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is that the language to which the gentleman from New York objects?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Except it was paraphrased considerably. He said the statement of the gentleman from New York, without any qualification whatever, made during his speech——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The language was that the statement made by the gentleman from New York was not true, and that I regarded as unparliamentary language.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, there is no infallibility resting in the mind of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have heard that for nine years in Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise? The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Chair is ready to rule—I was going to rise for the purpose of stating there was nothing unparliamentary at all in that language. A statement may be said——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to so rule. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. A statement may be said to be untrue without attributing falsehood to the maker of the statement; that would be attributed only when the maker knows that it was untrue.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the language is not unparliamentary, and the gentleman from Kentucky will proceed; and as five minutes of the gentleman's time has been consumed in this discussion, he will be given credit for that much time.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I am not at all surprised at the gentleman's effort to close my mouth and prevent me from further exposing his position. The people of his district who are in favor of restrictive immigration have been lead until the last few weeks to believe he was in favor of such a bill, and he is excusable for trying to take shelter behind the claim of insulted dignity, or a breach of parliamentary etiquette to shield himself from the searchlight of truth, and thereby if possible ward off their indignation.

I hold in my hand a letter from the commissioner of common schools of my county, dated March 23, 1906, who is now serving his fifth year, in which the following language is used:

The statement made by Mr. BENNET that 30.6 per cent of the voters of this county could neither read or write came like a peal of thunder from a clear sky. Knowing every man as I do in the county, his business and environments, I did not think I could be mistaken about this matter, so I began at once to investigate it. I went to the office where the assessors lists made last fall are on file and took them up one by one to see how many of them bore the original signatures of the voter, and I found that less than 15 per cent of them had not signed their own names, and these were principally the older men of our county. You will recall that our law requires every taxpayer to sign and swear to an affidavit as to his taxable property.

While among the older men of the county there is a higher rate of illiteracy than the younger ones, there is a good reason for it. Being a thinly settled country, with a total population of 11,256 in 1890, spread out over 387 square miles of territory, in many instances a school district would have to be 3 or 4 miles in length in order to contain pupils enough to establish a school. Under these circumstances education made the most surprising advancement, as shown by the census of 1900. In 1890 12.6 per cent of the children between 10 and 14 years of age were illiterate. In 1900 it was reduced to 8 per cent. In 1890 13.3 per cent between the ages of 15 and 19 years were illiterate, while in 1900 this was reduced to 9.5 per cent. This is a much better showing than exists right here in Washington, when we consider that the Government of the United States pays one-half of all the cost of conducting the schools, and where there are magnificent educational institutions embracing less territory than would be embraced in ten school districts in my county, if we are to believe what William H. Baldwin, of the civic center, said before the House Committee on the District of Columbia on the 16th day of last month, that there were only two cities in the country which had a greater percentage of illiteracy than the city of Washington, which was 8.6 per cent. This is not referred to to cast any reflection on our capital city.

From 1890 to 1900 the population of my county increased from 11,256 to 15,556, and is now at least 20,000, without any foreign immigration. In the little town where I live, with not more than 800 inhabitants, two splendid colleges have been built and opened in the last three years, and have a joint attendance of over 600 students.

The largest one, with more than 500 students, is entirely a home enterprise.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's reference to the illiteracy of the people of my county is not only unjust, but is in bad taste, when he has to come to us to get competent teachers for the high class of institutions of learning of which he boasts.

If my friend will give me his attention, I will tell him that a young man whose name is Marion J. Mayo, who was born, reared, and taught school in my county for several years, is now employed to teach mathematics his second year in the High School of Commerce, at 155 West Sixty-fifth street, New York City; that he is a young man strictly self-made, and that when examined by your board for license to teach was awarded the highest rate of anyone examined with him. He is but one of a large number of his type which we have contributed to other States, and you may well be proud of him.

Eight of the sixteen counties comprising my district are underlaid with rich beds of coal, which are being developed, and my people do not want to see the same conditions recur among them as exist in Pennsylvania and some parts of West Virginia, where the native American has been driven out by the Slav, the Pole, and the Hungarian, whose habits, customs, and manner of living is so far below the American standard that no American can compete with them or cares to live among them. These people have literally taken the coal fields of Pennsylvania, and the constant influx of more of them has turned them toward West Virginia, until last summer the governor of that State was asked by the Immigration Restriction League of Boston, who were trying to solve the problem of distribution of immigrants, if any more labor was needed in his State, to which he answered no; that they had an abundance.

Mr. Chairman, I thought I had made my position clear on this subject; but as some persons do not seem to understand it, I want to make it clear, which is this: That in addition to the classes already excluded, I would refuse admission to all assisted immigrants except the closest of kin—those so weak, either physically or mentally, as to endanger them becoming public charges, those who can not read some language, and all those who have not sufficient money to enable them to select their own location and take care of themselves until they can secure employment.

Turning again to the speech of my friend, who, without any excuse or justification gave a covert thrust at the judiciary of Kentucky and then turns to laud the courts and judges of his own State. I regret he has dragged this subject into this debate. I have always had the highest opinion of the judiciary of his State, and hope that I may always continue to have, for in the main it is of a high type of excellence and purity. It is to our judiciary that we must look for a just and honest enforcement of our laws and thereby secure the protection guaranteed by the Constitution of our lives, liberty, and property. As long as the courts are pure, and administer justice with clean hands, the people will respect them, and as long as this condition exists no harm can come to the Republic, but a corrupt judiciary will soon lose the respect of the people who, realizing that their rights are no longer protected, will take the law into their own hands and pandemonium will reign supreme.

I want to ask my friend, whom I understand to be an elder in the Presyterian Church, if he does not think it would be better, more charitable and Christian-like, to acquaint himself with the evils which exist in his household and try to correct them rather than to smirch the reputation of an unoffending neighbor. You say your judges are upright, your courts are pure, your laws are enforced, and life and property are safe. If this be true, why did Mr. Vandusen, who was appointed by the Department of Justice to investigate the innumerable frauds growing out of the naturalization of foreigners use this language in his report made last July:

> After a study of all the contributing causes of naturalization frauds and giving each due weight, I am fully convinced that the largest contributing factor is to be found in the judges of the courts dealing with naturalization matters.

And, referring to New York, he said:

> The Federal courts still maintained the same loose methods as previously followed in such cases and in some cases permitted, if they did not actually instigate, professional promoters of naturalization to openly solicit naturalization business for such courts, many of these promoters actually sending out circular letters and postal cards to aliens in which their headquarters were given as the Federal building in which the court was located. The Federal building, and in some cases the clerk's office, were overrun with these "agents" who would almost come to blows over the possession of the alien applicant. Schools of instruction for aliens were openly held in the Federal building by these agents, who read the stereotyped questions put to aliens in the clerk's office, and the answers thereto were dinned into the memory of the alien until, parrot-like, he could give the correct answers if the questions were put in the stereotyped order, but was hopelessly lost if the continuity of the questions was varied. Conditions of this nature grew into a public scandal in New York and Brooklyn in 1898 and 1899, and led the State election authorities to interfere because of the patent frauds being perpetrated.
>
> In New York City during October, 1891, about 7,000 naturalization certificates were isssued, mostly by one judge, who examined each applicant and his witnesses and signed his orders at the rate of two a minute. In one of the district courts of the United States the clerk was in the habit of swearing a lot of applicants and issuing certificates to them, no judge at all being present, and in another of the New York courts thousands of Italians were naturalized through an interpreter.
> On the trial of a clerk of a New York court it was proven that he sold naturalization certificates made out in blank, with forged signatures, at from $5 to $10.

It has been recently established that there are 50,000 fraudulent naturalization papers held in New York City alone; that agencies exist for the disposition of them; that a recent investigation has disclosed that one of these has sold 4,000 and another 2,000 in 1903.

The State superintendent of elections in New York stated in 1904 that probably $600,000 was made in the preceding year in the sale of fraudulent naturalization certificates, and that 100,000 had been sold in that State.

It is also charged that one-fourth of the Italians employed in the street-cleaning department obtained their positions by means of fraudulent naturalization papers. I am informed that under the municipal regulations of New York City preference is given to the citizen laborer in all public works, which is largely the cause why some of the aliens are willing to secure citizenship at any cost and by any kind of means.

The deputy superintendent of elections of the State recenly said that from 10 to 30 per cent of all the naturalization papers held by Italians in the State were fraudulent.

Mr. Chairman, these are but some of the reasons why I said to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] that if, as he said, the Italian was an average of the citizenship of his city, I should not go there to find a model citizenship.

Turning again to his eulogy on his courts, I am reminded that but a short time ago the attention of the country was attracted to his city by the trial of a very remarkable libel suit growing out of the publication of a periodical styled "Fads and Fancies," and intimately associated with another of the same unsavory reputation called "Town Topics," against which my friend Mr. COCKRAN, of New York, has now pending in this House a resolution looking to its exclusion from the mails.

The many sensational features growing out of this trial are too well remembered to need to be rehearsed again. It is only necessary to recall the fact that this publication was charged to be a "blackmailer and assassin of private character," and on this ground defense was made; the issue was tried and this plea was sustained by the verdict of the jury. In this trial a judge of one of the courts of New York City was shown to be in the employ of at least one of these publications, which created such a feeling that the district attorney, Mr. Jerome, and other prominent men of the city have asked his removal. The following clipping from the New York Daily World of the 16th of this month speaks for itself:

Justice Joseph M. Deuel again presided yesterday in the court of special sessions. Associated with him on the bench were Justices Olsted and McKean. Again there was the same old rumor afloat about the criminal court-house that Judge Deuel had intended to resign from his office. But his friends say there is no truth in the rumor.

District Attorney Jerome, Edward M. Shepard, and James W. Osborne, acting as citizens, having asked the appellate division of the supreme court to remove Judge Deuel from office on the ground that he violated the charter in that he worked for a salary for Town Topics, while at the same time drawing a salary from the city as a justice of the court of special sessions.

This judge was cited before the bar association to show cause why he should not be expelled because he was unworthy to associate with. Knowing that he would be expelled, he resigned from its membership.

The gentleman, without any justification, intended to cast a thrust at the judiciary of my State when he had read a clipping stating that County Judge Hargis, of Breathitt County, had been indicted for murder and that Curtis Jett, who had committed murder in Breathitt County more than two years ago, was still at large and untried. These statements have no bearing nor throw any light on the propriety or impropriety of restricting immigration. They only prove one thing, and that is that the gentleman is as ignorant of conditions which obtain in Kentucky as he is to those at home, if he meant to tell the truth when he said that—

I can walk through any street in New York City at any hour of the day or night and as long as I pay attention to my own business I will walk through in safety.

By the comparison which the gentleman has made, I am forced against my own will to refer to statements made by the public press of his own city, and not from sources 400 miles from New York, where he says only the sensational occurrences are published. But before referring to these facts I want to say that when Judge Hargis heard of the indictment against him he went into court and surrendered himself into custody and demanded a speedy trial, which has been fixed for an early date. In the country we only have three terms a year in each county of from one to three weeks each. As to Curtis Jett, he was arrested very soon after the murder of which he was accused and immediately put on trial, convicted, and sentenced to the penitentiary for life, where he is now and has been for nearly two years.

To the honor of our courts and for the benefit of my friend from New York [Mr. BENNET] I will explain to him the full history of the case against Jett which he refers to to cast reflection on the courts of Kentucky. Jett was indicted for the murder of a man by the name of Marcum and also a man by the name of Cockrell. He was put on trial for the murder of Marcum and convicted as above stated. At the following term of court he was taken out of the penitentiary and tried on the other charge and found guilty and sentenced to be hung. From this judgment he appealed to the Court of Appeals where, upon hearing, this last judgment was reversed and case remanded for retrial in the lower court. A few weeks ago he was taken back to the lower court to be again tried on this second charge. Instead of this case furnishing grounds for censuring the court, it presents a most extraordinary case of vigilence and persistency in upholding the law. [Applause.]

How does this statement compare with conditions in your own city, as shown in the following article taken from the New York Journal of the 16th of March, 1906?

Thirty-six persons, charged with murder, are in the Tombs to-day awaiting trial. Some of these have been locked in cells awaiting trial more than seven months. Eighty persons convicted of various crimes are in the Tombs awaiting to be taken into court and sentenced. With these and other prisoners charged with crimes of various degrees and awaiting trial, the Tombs is crowded to overflowing.

Because the prison is packed with persons whose cases are awaiting disposition it has been necessary to "double up" in many of the cells, placing two prisoners in each cell.

Never before since the new prison has been completed has there been such crowded conditions, and never before in the history of the Tombs, old or new, have there been so many persons charged with murder awaiting trial.

In the boys' prison there are eighty boys whose cases are awaiting disposition. This is 20 per cent more than ever before.

Although there are thirty-six persons in the Tombs to-day awaiting trial for murder, under normal conditions, the court and prison officials say, there should not at this time of the year be more than ten or a dozen.

In this review the statement is made that in the boys' prison there are eighty boys waiting for trial, which is 20 per cent more than ever before. I wonder how many of these belong to my friend's Sunday-school class! [Loud applause.] What has become of your juvenile court which you said you had had for five years, and that it had worked so well that this House copied it for the city of Washington only last week? Another striking feature of this article which is too long to insert it all is the large number of Italians and other foreigners among the murderers.

Referring to the discovery of the body of an Italian in Morris Canal, with his throat cut and his body riddled with bullets and a large stone around his neck, which was identified by the son of the Italian banker, John Bozuffi, who was kidnaped some two weeks ago and kept in a dungeon for a week, during which time they demanded of his father $20,000 for his release—the dead man was the one left to guard the boy, but through some neglect of his the boy escaped and they lost their booty, which so enraged them that they murdered their pal and threw his body in the canal—the New York Journal of the 16th instant says:

Nowhere in mountain fastness or forest recess is there a more cruel, bloodthirsty, or daring band of brigands than that now known to exist in this city for the purpose of kidnaping, blackmail, and murder.

To this band are now attributed many of the mysterious crimes that have stirred the police, including those of the several men found slain in different parts of the city, their bodies mutilated with knife and bullet wounds.

On the same day, and taken from a New York daily, is an article which relates to a condition of crime so horrifying that even abduction and murder lose their terror. I would not refer to it here if it were not for the fact that it throws more light on the kind of people we already have in the South and reminds our northern friends, who have spent so much time in heaping abuse on that section for its treatment of the negro, that your wives and daughters are not safe from their lustful desires even in the heart of the great city of New York. This is what it says:

More evidence of the infamous traffic in white girls, conducted, it is alleged, by the negro Spriggs and his confederates, was laid before the grand jury to-day by Assistant District Attorney Murphy, and new indictments are believed to be in preparation as a consequence. The men whom the district attorney is seeking to bring within the pale of the law now that he has R. H. Spriggs in jail are the white decoys and professional abductors whom Spriggs, it is charged, employed. Evidence is also being heard, it is rumored, which incriminates several policemen and police officials formerly stationed in the precinct where Spriggs had his headquarters.

Fifty girls, employed in factories and stores of the Tenderloin and lower west side, have disappeared within the short space of three months, and, according to the information given to the police by their parents and friends, most of them are now said to be held in captivity and suffering untold tortures at the hands of the negro dealers in white slaves.

Although the raids made by the district attorney's office over the heads of the police have uncovered numerous dens of iniquity not only in the dark corners of the metropolis, but within the very heart of the city, amid the glare and glitter of Broadway, hundreds of negro clubs are allowed to run in full blast. These clubs, where the white women meet the negroes, are the main feeders of the white-slave market.

As a result of the alleged protection of the Tenderloin dives, Commissioner Bingham yesterday transferred twenty-six patrolmen from that precinct to other parts of the city. Another shake up is expected in the Charles Street Precinct, in which were located several of the Spriggs dens.

While the southern people, surrounded in many places by large numbers of these people with but small protection, have sometimes had to take the law in their own hands and make examples of some to terrify others, for which they have each times been most bitterly arraigned by those who knew least about the situation, be it said to their honor that no southern man, official or private, has ever been accused of failing to defend the virtue and chastity of our women from the assaults of brutal assailants. Why were these twenty-six patrolmen changed from this district if they were doing their duty? Is it not a reflection on them, that they were guilty of criminal neglect or knowingly winking at crime?

A gentleman living in New York and in close touch with public affairs, in a letter written on the 22d of this month, on the subject of foreign immigration, used these words:

In a night walk from Madison Square to Rutgers Square only last week I counted eighteen curbstone socialistic and anarchistic orators damning the laws of the country and cursing the courts. Night after night they are listened to by the populace, and the lawless population is growing faster than any public institution can instill the law-abiding instincts.

To him I am indebted for the following statement:

LIST OF MAFIA MURDERS UNPUNISHED IN NEW YORK AND ENVIRONS SINCE 1904.

Felice Aurienna, shot, Grand and Mulberry, August, 1904.
James L. Hussey, shot, 351 East Thirteenth, November, 1904.
Caligiro Saloco, shot at home, 225 Third street, April 15, 1904.
Giovanni Domando, shot at home, 64 Franklin, October 10.
Guiseppe Catania, grocer, found at Bay Ridge, throat cut.
Stranger, Caligostro Bank, June, 1904.
Batisti Fondiero, First avenue and One hundred and seventeenth street, January 1, 1905.
Michele Degiobani, Bushwick and Johnson avenues, December 16, 1904.
Macola Derosa, 68 Adams, January 10, 1904.
Allio Salvatore, Columbus H., November 18, 1904.
Antonio Prinze, 5 James street, December 4, 1904.
Antonio Finetierrie, January 23, 1905, Van Brunt street.
Dominico De Phillipo, Shore Road, December 30, 1905.
Stranger, found East New York, December 8, 1904.
Giovanni Vitale, Fourteenth avenue, Astoriam, September 11, 1905.
Giovanni Barbarino, 168 Columbia Place, July 19, 1905.
Francesco Puglio, July 20, 1905.
Giovanni Guzzito and brother, July 2, 1905, Tuckahoe.
Stranger, Long Island Railroad yard, September 25, 1905.
Gennaro Colonna, One hundred and eighty-ninth street, September 5, 1905.

Guiseppe Ledato, One hundred and eighty-ninth street, September 5, 1905.
Spechano de Luiram, 334 East Sixty-third, October 9, 1905.
Gaetano Costa, 861 Fourth avenue, Brooklyn, October 11, 1905.
Stranger, October 14, 1905, North Eighth and Driggs.
Twelve cases of buildings being blown up by dynamite, ten of them tenements and two in Mr. BENNET'S district.
Six cases of kidnapping for ransom, 40 cases of murderous assault, and over 700 cases of extortion that were made public, which means as many thousand that were never heard of.

The reasons for murders being unpunished are that Italians either befriend the criminals or remain silent through fear, knowing the American police can not protect them from secret vengeance.

In the whole United States in a similar time nine officers of the law and magistrates have been assassinated by the Mafia, whose total crimes of record are over 5,000, against which only thirty-two punishments are recorded, and many of these being convictions for carrying concealed weapons, the only unlawful act that could be proved against men believed to have committed murder, and that because when arrested they were armed.

This is only offered in answer to the claim that life and property are safer in New York than in Kentucky, and most of them being reported at the time my friend was making his speech.

Now, I want to read you an extract from the official report of Magistrate Wahle, president of the board of magistrates of New York City for 1905:

There was an increase of arraignments in that year of 18,388, which is entirely due to aliens from southeast Europe. That there is an actual decline in the number of arraignments of native-born immigrants from northern and western Europe. Nevertheless, crime was increasing at a startling rate, and there were 2,450 more arrests for felony in New York City in 1905 than in 1904.

In other words, 2,151 fewer American-born defendants were held for trial and confined in 1905 than in the year 1904. A comparative reduction in the number of persons held or confined who were born in Ireland, Germany, or France, and there is an increase in the number of persons held or confined born in Italy of 1,455, and an increase of 2,463 in the number of those born in Russia, and an increase of 608 of the number of those born in Greece.

Doctor Darlington, president of the board of health of New York City, last June made a special investigation of the push-cart business, under direction of Mayor McClellan, in which he says:

I have heard the assertion that immigrants were necessary to carry on our public works—build railroads, dig canals, and the like. But it seems to me that the immigrants who are coming in now do not come for that purpose and will not do that sort of work. No; they prefer to become push-cart peddlers and to live in poverty in our cities, breeding disease and crime. They occupy the streets belonging to the city—streets for which the taxpayers have paid heavily. They interfere with traffic and break the laws of sanitation which are necessary for the preservation of the public health.

The prevalence of smallpox in New York City in 1902 was clearly traceable to these foreign conditions. And in 1903 foreign immigrant children spread trachoma in the public schools of Manhattan, affecting not less than 10 per cent of all the children, which cost many thousands of dollars to stamp out. The prevalence and spread of fourteen out of the nineteen epidemics of smallpox which have occurred in Chicago since 1863 are due to foreign immigration.

Last year in New Orleans, during the yellow-fever scourge, the presence of the Italian was the only problem which could not be reached or controlled. They lived in haunts and dives and could not be induced to observe any sanitary regulations. When the health officers of the city had exhausted every means in their power, they sent the priests to plead with them, but this was of no avail. When one of their number would happen to be stricken, they would conceal the fact, not even calling a doctor. In one instance one of these men died of yellow fever in the outskirts of the city. Instead of burying his body like civilized people, they dumped it into an open well to furnish food for the mosquitoes with which to inoculate the rest of the community. Can there be any wonder why the South does not want any more of these people?

My friend says they have strikes in New York, but that they are always orderly and peaceful and never attended with violence. This, like his other statements, won't bear the searchlight of truth. Let us take what the New York Herald of the 11th of March, 1906, says:

ATTACKS UPON PROPERTY BY DYNAMITE AND OTHERWISE.

November 28: Derricks wrecked in American Can Building, Tenth avenue and Fifteenth street.
December 7: Derricks wrecked and machinery destroyed in Altman Building, Fifth avenue and Thirty-fourth street.
December 19: Dynamite bomb hurled into nonunion employment agency, No. 7 East Fourteenth street.
December 22: Hoisting machinery damaged in Altman Building.
January 9: Dynamite bomb thrown into Bliss Building, in East Twenty-third street.
February 1: Dynamite bomb exploded in Child's Foundry, Kingsland avenue, Brooklyn.
February 24: Three men caught in act of exploding 13 pounds of dynamite in Bliss Building, East Twenty-third street.
March 5: Rovitch Brothers' Foundry destroyed by explosion, One hundred and thirty-sixth street and Madison avenue.

This article takes up each one of the cases and describes them in detail. It is too long to insert it all. I have only used that part referring to the attempt to destroy the Bliss Building.

With this great daily paper recounting in detail where one after another of these great property owners have to keep special private guards over their property day and night to save it from destruction at the hands of the dynamiter, why the gentleman should make the statements he does I can not understand. With this long list of outrages committed in three months, chargeable to a single strike, where would the list end if I should recount them all for even one year back?

My friend boasts of the great wealth of his city, which I admit you have. But when I recall the facts brought out in recent investigations showing how large sums of it got there, and am further reminded that it is the center of all the unlawful trusts and combines which now fester the body politic, and how large sums of these ill-gotten gains have been used for corruption and debauchery, I am content to say we do not covet such wealth; we would rather be honest than rich. [Applause.]

I have listened in vain for my friend to mention two good things which we all recognize he has in New York, and these are the United States Senators from his State. Perhaps the following clipping taken from the New York Daily World of the 16th of March, 1906, may explain his silence.

But after second thought I will not read it, as it would be more charitable not to do so, although it comes from a member of the Republican county committee of New York.

The gentleman says that the highest scale of wages are paid in New York, and even in the sweat shops the average wages were $20 per week.

Let us see what others say on this subject. Hall, in his work on immigration, says (on p. 68):

As a matter of fact, we know that at all times an appreciable per cent of labor is unemployed, and at certain times a large per cent, and it can not be assumed that immigrants coming in vast numbers to a strange land will at once or continuously be employed in the occupation for which they are fitted, or that they receive the average wages in those occupations. Indeed, we know that directly the opposite is true. We know that the proprietors of the sweat shops pay starvation wages, and that the padrone supplies laborers at from 25 to 60 per cent less than current wages of unskilled labor. We know that because of the congestion in cities recent immigrants have greatest difficulty to obtain employment at all, and that the often repeated demand of the labor organization for further restrictions is due not only to increased competition, but to the competition of those who are willing to cut wages.

On page 134:

The wages paid by the sweater are from one-quarter to one-half those formerly obtained by independent workmen. From the fact that attics, tenements, and cellars are used for shops, and because of the low wages paid, the sweater is able with foot power to compete with the machine power of the factory.

His day's work is not numbered by hours, but alone by the test of physical endurance.

The sweat shop is where the cheap articles of clothing are made, which work is now done almost entirely by Jews. Before the advent of machinery and the great overflow of pauper immigrant labor, each one of which has helped to reduce the cost of production and as a natural consequence reduced wages, the English, Irish, and other native-born Americans did this work, for which they received good wages and lived only as American workingmen do.

The following extract from the report of Hebrew charities of New York City not only paints a sad picture of the sweat-shop conditions and how it leads to destroyed health, want, poverty, and finally to public dependency, but says that it is essentially the problem of our immigration:

No matter how earnestly we labor to care for the Jewish poor in our city our burdens are being constantly increased by the thousands who come from Europe each year in our midst. It is worth noting in passing that, comparatively speaking, few of these newly arrived immigrants come to us for assistance until they have been in New York for a year or two. Either they have sufficient means of their own to bring them to America and to support them for a period after arrival or they have been sent for by relatives who are able to give them assistance for some time. But the evil conditions of the houses and the deteriorating influences of the sweat shops of the great ghetto soon work havoc among these people, and after an interval of two or three years they come to us in numbers for relief.

A condition of chronic poverty is developing in the Jewish community of New York that is appalling in its immensity. Forty-five per cent of our applicants, representing between 20,000 and 25,000 human beings, have been in the United States over five years, have been given the opportunities for economic and industrial improvement which this country affords, yet, notwithstanding all this, have not managed to reach a position of economic independence.

Two thousand five hundred and eighty-five of the new applicants, representing 7 per cent of the Jewish immigration to the United States during the year, found it necessary to apply at the office of the United Hebrew Charities within a short time after arrival. It must be remembered, furthermore, that the Hebrew charities does not represent the entire Jewish poverty and dependence that exists in New York City.

The problem of the care of the Jewish poor in the city of New York is essentially the problem of the immigrant, and as such it passes beyond merely local lines.

I want to call your attention to what the present commissioner of immigration at New York City and his predecessor say of the character of the present immigration In Commissioner Williams's report for the year ending June 30, 1903 (which is contained in the annual report of the Commissioner-General of Immigration for 1903), is to be found the following quotation:

A strict execution of our present laws makes it possible to keep out what may be termed the worst element of Europe. Without a proper execution of the same, it is safe to say that thousands of additional aliens would have come here last year. But these laws do not reach a large body of immigrants, who, while not of this class, are yet generally undesirable, because unintelligent, of low vitality, of poor physique, able to perform only the cheapest kind of manual labor, desirous of locating almost exclusively in the cities, by their competition tending to reduce the standard of living of the American wage-earner, and unfitted mentally or morally for good citizenship. It would be quite impossible to accurately state what proportion of last year's immigration should be classed as "undesirable." I believe that at least 200,000 (and probably more) aliens came here who, although they may be able to earn a living, yet are not wanted, will be of no benefit to the country, and will, on the contrary, be a detriment, because their presence will tend to lower our standards; and if these 200,000 persons could have been induced to stay at home, nobody, not even those clamoring for more labor, would have missed them. Their coming has been of benefit chiefly, if not only, to the transportation companies which brought them here.

On June 19 last Hon. Robert Watchorn, the present commissioner of immigration at New York, and it should be borne in mind that the commissioner at New York handles about 80 per cent of the present alien immigration, spoke as follows at an immigration conference held at the rooms of the Board of Trades and Transportation, 203 Broadway, New York City:

I do not agree with some of the speakers here this afternoon that the law as it now stands is all that it ought to be. I think that there are people coming into this country to-day who ought not to come in. But I think the law is inadequate to keep them out as it now stands. What is needed, in my opinion, is a drastic law which shall state specifically what is desirable and what is not desirable.

About a year ago the United Garment Workers, of New York City, about 70 per cent of whom are foreign born, by referendum vote passed strong resolutions and petitioned Congress to pass a law restricting immigration. Their official organ, The Weekly Bulletin of Clothing Trades, edited by J. W. Sullivan, is constantly advocating the passage of such a law, and he made the strongest speech made before the New York Civic Federation at its meeting held last June in favor of restrictive immigration.

The following extract from the speech made by Cyrus L. Sulzberger at a meeting of the United Hebrew Charities of New York on the 19th of last month appeared in his paper on the 23d day of March, 1906. Mr. Sulzberger is a very wealthy and philanthropic Jew, living in my friend Mr. BENNET'S district, where there is so much boasted wealth and splendid wages paid, according to Mr. BENNET'S statement. This is only a part of what he said:

Twelve hundred mothers and their 3,000 children are starving to death in New York on the munificence of the Jewish community.

It was easy enough to move your hearts when the stories of atrocities began to come from Russia, but what was that compared to our daily massacres, our continued slaughter of the innocents? They do things more kindly in Russia. There they kill a child in three days. Here we take years to kill it by slow starvation, and this in the richest Jewish community that ever was gathered together in the world.

There are 700,000 Jews in New York, and only 4,000 who contribute to the Hebrew charities. There are 600 pensioners on our lists, and we distribute among them $40,000 a year—$70 apiece. Do you wonder that the mothers become consumptive and the fathers become consumptive, and the children die? And there are 40,000 others for whom you haven't given us one cent.

Mr. Chairman, these conditions, which form only a part of the evils arising from our foreign immigration system, are not confined to New York alone, but they exist in all of the large cities where foreign immigrants have formed congestion. One of the inspectors called as a witness before the Industrial Commission testified that after two days' inspection of the sweat shops of Philadelphia he had found such filth, vice, suffering, and actual starvation that he was unable to continue his investigation.

Robert Hunter, in his work on poverty, says that in 1903 there were 60,463 families evicted for nonpayment of rent in the borough of Manhattan, which was 14 per cent of the entire number, while there were only 20 per cent of evictions in 1897. This last date was the hardest business year we ever had, while 1903 is the best, and does not show a good sign of good wages.

Hall, in his work on immigration, says that in 1902 15 per cent of all workers in New York were idle, and more than half of them from lack of work and not from strikes or sickness; that there were only 20 per cent idle in 1897.

Mr. Chairman, in a former speech before this House I dwelt at length on the methods pursued by the Austro-Hungarian Government in inducing emigration to the United States, basing my remarks largely on the report of Special Immigration Inspector Marcus Braun, who, it will be remembered, caught Government officials at Budapest rifling his mail, which he resented, as a consequence of which he was arrested and fined. In the investigation of this affair our Minister to Austria, Hon. Bellamy Storer, at Vienna, sided with the Austro-Hungarian Government, and through his efforts brought about the resignation of Mr. Braun under a cloud upon his character, which was brought about by the foreign government with the purpose of throwing discredit on his report.

In a special dispatch from New York to the Washington Post March 21 it is stated that the recall of Mr. Storer is due to the efforts of his wife to entagle our Government through President Roosevelt in foreign church matters. It will be remembered that Mr. Braun pointed out in his report that that Government was attempting to use the influence of the church to control their immigrants in this country. Mr. Braun has demanded of the State Department a full investigation of the whole affair, and it is strongly hinted that still greater surprises are in store than those brought out in his report, and that he will be vindicated there is no doubt. The case sounds very much like the old story of the devil, the woman, and the apple.

I now want to briefly refer to some more of the reasons going to show why we are getting such a large number of Italian immigrants. Italy, being among the oldest civilized countries, is overpopulated, and, together with the islands of Sicily, Sardinia, and Elba, has a total area of 110,684 square miles—a little more than twice the size of the State of New York—with a population of 32,449,754 in 1901, which is 293 persons to the square mile, ranking third in this respect to the countries of Europe. Of this number 20 per cent own all the land, while 40 per cent are tenants, and the remaining 40 per cent are laborers, whose daily wages run from 16 to 40 cents a day. Her public debt is more than two and a half times as large as that of the United States and is $81.10 per capita of her population. Forty-two and one-half per cent of her revenues is required to pay the interest on the public debt and 23½ per cent is required to sustain her army and navy.

To meet these enormous expenses the highest rate of tax is collected, from which nothing is exempt, and it is said that the peasant tenant is taxed from 25 to 50 per cent of his income. Under these conditions is it strange that one of the most serious questions the Government has to meet is how to provide for and control her subjects to keep them loyal and prevent uprising, especially among the lower classes? One of these plans is to encourage emigration, which is being systematically carried out to such an extent that for a number of years past her annual emigration has exceeded 500,000 souls. To encourage and facilitate this enormous movement the Government has established an emigration department, which differs from our Bureau of Immigration, whose chief object is to look after those who seek to come into our country. Their object is to send them out.

Of the 506,000 emigrants from Italy in 1904 the greater majority of those leaving northern Italy went to other countries of Europe, Australia, and South America, while 67 per cent of the whole number—coming to America, and chiefly from southern Italy—came to the United States. The recent discussions of the question of restrictive immigration in this country has caused such alarm in Italy that in 1903 the minister of public instruction proposed to the emigrant department to establish schools for the purpose of preparing emigrants for entry in our ports in the event that an educational qualification should be prescribed here.

Acting on this suggestion the emigration department immediately appropriated 50,000 lire, which added 450 to the 3,000 schools already established to give instructions to illiterates in the evenings and on Sundays. Seventy of these newly opened schools were at Avellino, where the percentage of illiteracy was 73.9; and 62 of them at Teramo, where the percentage was 74.9. The department has prepared a chart of the United States for special use in these schools. This chart gives the number of Italians living in each State, and the proportion of Italians to the other population. By special marks it indicates the cities where the largest Italian population is, and where the Italian consuls reside, together with much more of like information. Mr. Chairman, I assert that no general leading an invading hostile army ever took greater precaution to map out and plan his campaign than the Italian Government has planned against the United States, and is daily carrying into execution.

The emigration department of Italy, like Austria-Hungary, is exerting all its power to retain its control over its subjects while in this country, and insure their return when they have earned enough money to return home and add it to the wealth of the Kingdom. I have already said that an imperial commissioner of the Government made the voyage on every ship leaving an Italian port carrying immigrants to this country, whose duty it was to coach the immigrants and teach them how to answer the questions asked at our ports to enable them to enter, and to urge them not to become American citizens, but to remain loyal to the mother country.

They have made the Bank of Naples the authorized agent of the emigration department for the transmission of the money of the immigrants. Through this bank in 1904 passed 125,133 drafts from the United States, totaling 22,000,000 lire, and not less than 30,000,000 went through other channels.

They have subsidized the Society for Italian Immigrants of New York 35,000 lire, and the Italian Benevolent Institute of the same place 25,000 lire.

So greedy are they of the profit and benefits which they are deriving from the immigration business that the department of emigration complains against the number of prepaid tickets sent from this country to Italy. In 1904 there were 57,745, and in the first five months of 1905 there were 45,881 of these prepaid or assisted immigrants from Italy alone. How many of these were in violation of the contract-labor law is unknown, but doubtless most of them.

Mr. Chairman, under this system we have seen the Italian population grow in New York City until there are more Italians there than in any city in Italy except Naples, Milan, and Rome. Indeed it has assumed such proportions that it is proudly pointed to from home, where they are called "our colonies," and propositions have been made in Roman Parliament to give them representation. It has been asserted that "Little Italy," in New York, contributes more to the tax rolls of Italy than the poorer provinces in Sicily or Calabria.

My much-esteemed friend, Mr. GOLDFOGLE of New York, injects this amusing statement into the speech of Mr. BENNET:

That immigrant classes found in New York City in the congested portions and elsewhere are perfectly peaceable and law-abiding—anxious to learn and to assimilate with the citizenship of New York.

I am extremely fond of my friend Mr. GOLDFOGLE, whose many virtues and amiable qualities I should love to see inherited and handed down to future generations, but my feelings are mingled with amusement and disappointment when I refer to this biography and find no reference to age or family relations, which means that he is a bachelor, and his gray locks plainly tells that he has long since passed the day when he is willing to tell his age, and it makes no difference how anxious the foreigners, made up of Italians, Poles, Turks, Slavs, etc., are to assimilate with the citizens of New York, they will have to excuse my venerable friend from anything more than offering friendly suggestions. [Laughter and applause.]

The following extract from the report of the commissioner-general of emigration of Italy, made in 1904, presents the strongest arguments why they are largely undesirable:

Despite the admittedly progressive improvement in our emigrants, they are still considered in some respects by Americans as little desirable. They are mostly day laborers and peasants, an active and useful element, but considered unstable and not susceptible of being assimilated; the proportion of those unable to read and write among our emigrants is still high. The Italians, moreover, tend to crowd in the great urban centers where they live a life apart, with habits of possibly too great economy in contrast with the habits of Americans.

It is also an admission that they come for temporary stay and live and act with but one view, and that is to make and save all the money they can and return home with it. This is further shown by the large number of men over women who come from Italy. In 1905, out of 221,479 immigrants, there were only 38,761 females. In 1904, Italian immigrants numbered 193,296. The same year 129,231 returned to Italy. Mr. Emil Boas, general manager of the Hamburg-American line of steamships, is authority for the statement that in 1904 575,000 immigrants passed through Ellis Island into New York, and that 322,000 departed from the same port. Six hundred and ninety-three thousand entered through four Atlantic ports and 359,000 departed. If you want any stronger proof than that contained in the statement of the Italian emigration commissioner "that the Italians crowd in the slum centers, living to themselves in a way as to present too great a contrast with the habits of Americans," go down to Purdy's court, which is within 500 feet of this Hall, and within 100 feet of the Peace Monument, and you will see a veritable Italian huddle, where as many as a dozen of these people live in a single room. Within a stone's throw of the southwest corner of the Botanic Garden are three other such settlements, in which there is not a comfort of life to be seen.

The Italian laborers, which represent 80 per cent of those who come from Italy, have become so inoculated with the padrone system that when they go out to seek employment they do not ask employment, but offer to buy it by offering a money consideration. I want to read a letter received by me from Mr. H. R. Fuller, who is a representative of the brotherhoods of railroad engineers, firemen, conductors, and trainmen, which is as follows:

206 DELAWARE AVENUE, NE.,
Washington, D. C., March 17, 1905.

Hon. F. A. HOPKINS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: With regard to the objectionable class of immigrants who are coming to our shores and the disadvantage to which an American workman is put in competing with them in the labor market, I would respectfully call your attention to one important feature which, in the discussion of this subject, seems to have been lost sight of, and that is that many of these foreign laborers (principally Italians) in seeking employment offer a money consideration for a job.

These offers of money are often accepted by foremen, and in addition to this there are many cases where these laborers pay their foremen a monthly stipend in order to hold their positions. I recall one instance where a division of railroad was divided between two road supervisors. It was the aim of one of these men to employ none but this class of laborers, while on that part of the road in charge of the other man all classes were employed. An investigation was made by the management, and it was found that the man whose employees were of this particular class was collecting amounts from them monthly.

The American workman feels that he is worthy of his hire and will not submit to such practice, and to compel him to compete under such conditions and at the same time rear and educate his family is putting him at a disadvantage.

Yours, truly,
H. R. FULLER.

Mr. Chairman, in the light of all these threatening menaces to our laboring people is it any wonder that their representatives come here by the hundreds to beseech Congress and the President to relieve them from such unjust and unfair competition? Nor is it any wonder that their influence is being made felt to such an extent that one of the leaders on the other side of the aisle has importuned the majority leader to secure the passage of a restrictive measure or that he will be defeated in the coming election.

Mr. Chairman, this evil is growing every day. While the whole country was surprised at the high figures our immigration registered last year, those figures will be largely outnumbered this year, showing a still greater contrast between the home builders of the north and the birds of passage of southern Europe. During the first eight months of this fiscal year there was an increase of nearly 4,000 over the number entering during the corresponding period for last year. There was an increase of more than 53,000 Italians, and a decrease of 47,000 immigrants from northern Europe for the same period. At the same rate of gain the immigration from Italy will reach 300,000 this year, almost one-third of the entire immigration. That this is the result of the systematic work of the foreign governments, the steamship companies, the padrone, and the contract-labor pirates no one can doubt for one minute if they will only take the trouble to investigate. Standing on the wharf at Castle Garden in New York last Saturday during the landing from a single ferryboat load of immigrants, I saw Italian padrone agents culling out the Italians and corralling them in a corner until they had gotten together more than 200 men and a dozen women, where they were kicked and shoved about like cattle by these agents until everyone else had passed out and the way was clear, when the sign to move was given. With one agent to lead and the other to bring up the stragglers, they marched to the padrone headquarters, where they are hired out to such firms or persons as will pay the padrone the best price for them, which in the end is taken from their wages. The padrone gets a fee of from $3 to $5 from each Italian for securing him a job and $2 from the employer for furnishing the laborer. After they get out from under the control of the padrone they make their own contracts, and when it is remembered that they came from a country where the daily wage is from 15 to 30 cents it is not strange that they are willing to buy their jobs.

Mr. Chairman, I could recount many more of the evils of our present immigration system, but have not the time. And in closing I want to say that the laboring people of this country are thoroughly alive to the dangers which threaten their homes and know full well in whose hands the corrective influences are held, and the man or party that turns a deaf ear to their pleas for justice will live to regret it. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BEDE].

Mr. BEDE. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire at this time to make any extended remarks upon the bill which is now before the House, further than to say that since coming to Congress I have always voted for the appropriation for a fast mail from New York to New Orleans, on the ground that it is a good thing for the southern people to read the northern papers at the earliest practicable time. [Laughter.] I do not know but the purpose of that fast mail has been attained. The exhibition of spirit and character shown on the floor to-day, from the delegation from North Carolina and other Southern States, indicates to me that they have equaled, if they have not surpassed, their northern brethren. However, because of the somewhat depressed commercial conditions of the South, I think it may be well for us to continue this appropriation a few years longer and give our southern brethren the benefit of the doubt. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer this resolution, which I ask the Clerk to read, and shall use it as the basis of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the resolution will be read as a part of the gentleman's remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas under a joint resolution of Congress of date of March 1, 1845, entitled "Joint resolution for annexing Texas to the United States," the republic of Texas was admitted into the Union of States; and

Whereas under the terms of said joint resolution it was provided that "new States of convenient size, not exceeding four in number, in addition to said State of Texas, may hereafter, by the consent of said State of Texas, be formed out of the Territory thereof, which shall be admitted under the provisions of the Federal Constitution, thus entitling said State, upon proper action being taken, to a representation of ten Senators in the United States Senate; and

Whereas a sentiment is manifesting itself at this time in said State of Texas in favor of exercising said privilege of subdivision in accordance with the right she possesses under the terms of said act of Congress; and

Whereas the suggestion is being offered that the said State of Texas be subdivided by projecting from Austin, the capital of said State, lines to the border limits thereof, making four lesser States—to wit, North Texas, South Texas, East Texas, and West Texas—said States to have one chief executive and lieutenant-governor in common, each to be apportioned into Congressional districts in accordance with its population, and be provided with a legislative body consisting of a house of representatives, to be presided over by a lieutenant-governor, who shall reside within the limits of the particular State and be chargeable with the enforcement of its law, which house of representatives, acting in conjunction with a general State senate, to be composed of an equal number of senators elected from each of said four States and presided over by the chief lieutenant-governor, elected at the same time and in the same manner as the chief executive, shall make all laws for the administration and government of said lesser States, and each of said houses of representatives, acting with the general State senate, to be authorized to elect two citizens, residents of the particular State, possessing proper qualifications to represent the same in the Senate of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be, and same is hereby, requested to advise the House whether the proposed subdivision of said State of Texas hereinbefore outlined would be in any sense violative of the constitutional provision which guarantees to each State a republican form of government, and, further, whether same would be a division of said State in compliance with the terms of said joint resolution of March 1, 1845, which would entitle said four States to elect eight Senators to represent said States in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. BEDE. Mr. Chairman, this may seem a novel proposition, but it is not such. Texas stands alone among the States of the Union. She holds a unique place in history. Within a single century she has paid allegiance to five flags—that of Spain, of Mexico, of the Republic of Texas, of the Confederacy, and now for a second time she stands beneath the flag—

Whose stripes have streamed in glory,
To foes a fear, to friends a festal robe,
And spread in rythmic lines the sacred story
Of freedom's triumph over all the globe.

[Applause.]

And long before she dreamt of the Lone Star of her own Republic of Texas, before Mexico had broken away from Spain or the flag of Spain had reached the Rio Grande, her soil had been dominated by the tricolor of France. She has had her own declaration of independence, her own constitution, and when she came to us it was as a sister republic and not as a dependent territory. She came on the condition that she might, in her own right, divide herself into five States and send ten Senators here to Washington. She came to us with a history of her own. She came a sovereign, singing her own national hymn, and with the glory of the Alamo as a halo about her head.

Some may say that States must be admitted on an equality. They never have been admitted on an equality in the history of our Union. You can not make Texas and Rhode Island equal. You can not make New York and Delaware equal, except in the legal sense of sovereignty. In the old days we admitted free States and we admitted slave States, and the very enabling act that admitted the Republic of Texas provided that the States formed out of the territory north of the Missouri Compromise line should be free, and all formed out of the territory south of the compromise line should be free or slave as their people might determine.

So we see that States have been admitted into this Union not on an equality, and the whole question that I submit to the Judiciary Committee is, What is a State and what is a republican form of government? I hear—I do not know how true the statement may be, and I do not want to say that anybody would state an untruth on this floor, after the experience we have just had [laughter]—but I have heard it said on this floor that the States of Ohio and Pennsylvania, and certain other great States, owed allegiance to some bosses in those States before they owed it to the Republic of the United States. And, if that be true, why may not Texas subdivide herself into four States, have a central government, a governor over all, and lieutenant-governors in the four several States, and elect eight United States Senators? There is nothing about it, in my judgment, unconstitutional, but there are a great many things which are constitutional that this Congress isn't going to do. I understand that perfectly well. It would be entirely constitutional for us to come in here to-morrow morning and admit Oklahoma to the Union, but we are not going to do it just because it would be constitutional. It would be constitutional for us to cease to compel Arizona and New Mexico to come in together, but we are not going to do that right away, it seems to me, from the history of affairs in this House. [Laughter.]

I have been pleased to find the allegiance of the delegation from Texas to her own Lone Star State holding itself with an unfaltering trust even when the other brethren of the South had come over and supported the Federal quarantine bill. They stood up in a solid phalanx of sixteen and voted for Texas rather than for Uncle Sam. I rather like such sweet devotion, for their great State is big enough for an empire or republic of its own. [Applause.] It reminded me of an incident which occurred in Duluth a few years ago when a pretty little Scandinavian girl who had recently come over from her native land and had learned something of our language, but who had not learned all of our ways, attended church. The minister, in keeping with his custom, stood at the door, and as the audience passed out shook hands and said a kind word to each. He asked the girl her name and where she lived, and then, thinking only of his pastoral duty, added, "I will call on you in a few days," when she exclaimed, "Oh, but I have got a feller already." [Laughter.]

And so Texas has a "fellow" already. She is a wonderful Commonwealth, and her people can scarcely have a greater love for any outside power than they have for their local government. But I remember when to tell a man to go to Texas was just like telling him to go to the other place. [Laughter.] I remember when Texas was a synonym for hell, and now it is almost as populous—and two Senators are not enough to represent such a country as that. [Great laughter and applause.]

There is now an attempt within Texas herself to subdivide the State for local governmental purposes into north Texas, east Texas, south Texas, and west Texas. The whole State, with its 262,000 square miles, is too big for the practical purposes of government. The farmers of north Texas are mostly native Americans and believe in prohibition of the liquor traffic. The people of southern Texas are largely of European extraction and want their beer. North Texas has land worth up to $100 an acre. The people there put the assessment very low and can meet their local obligations; and so the farmers of south Texas who have low-priced land complain constantly against the farmers of north Texas, and there are criminations back and forth because of the wonderful difference of conditions between the north and the south. Southern Texas raises cotton, sugar, rice, tobacco, and protectionists. [Laughter.] They have a Member of Congress in this House who voted against the Philippine tariff bill this winter because his people believe in protecting home industry. Western Texas raises cattle and is engaged in mining and also believes in protection. There is in this House a Member from western Texas who voted for the Dingley bill because western Texas believes in protection. Eastern Texas has fruit farmers and truck gardeners who are low-tariff people. They want drainage laws and legislation preventing anyone from holding large tracts of land.

Out in the western part they want irrigation and they want laws passed for large holdings. So you have the prohibitionists in the north and the liberal thinkers in the south, you have fruit growers in the east and miners and stock raisers in the west, and thus the State of Texas, although bound together by the glory of the Alamo and the history of its republic, is on the verge of dividing up into subordinate States in order to have a better local government. Yet, in spite of the experience of Texas—and this is the real moral of my remarks—this House proposes to compel Arizona and New Mexico to get together and make another State just as great as that of Texas, whose people would in future be constantly criminating each other. And so I hold that we should, in acting reasonably upon this question, make into a single Commonwealth only a sufficient area within which the people may have common interests, in which there shall not be bickering or backbiting, nor quarreling over taxes or the rates of assessment upon similar forms of property, and in which the people may have a common interest and stand together in all their affairs.

Some have complained that there are not folks enough out in Arizona. There will be folks enough out there in a few years. Plans are now formed for the irrigation of 600,000 acres of arid land, and in many cases irrigated land supports one person to the acre. I predict that in the next twenty years a half million people will go into the State of Arizona, and if they have half a million people added to what they have now they will surpass the population of the average State east of the Mississippi River. If you should admit Oklahoma as a single State, if you should permit Texas to organize herself into a little republic of four States, if you should admit Arizona and New Mexico separately, you would then have west of the Mississippi River twenty-five States, with fifty Senators. East of the Mississippi River there are twenty-six States, with fifty-two Senators, so that the West must always be outnumbered by the Senators from the East, and yet in the future history of our country the territory west of the Mississippi River, twice and a half times as great as that in the East, will double in population that of our eastern brethren.

I am therefore asking for more Senators from the West. I know they will not immediately represent as many folks as Senators from the great States of the East, but, gentlemen, I feel that the Senators, the members of the upper House of Congress—where there is real deliberation, as is being exhibited now upon the rate bill—should be so distributed over our continental area as to come in contact with all the different environments of this great Republic, for it is environment that shapes the conduct of men in public life. You have six States in New England, 61,000 square miles, and twelve Senators. Does anyone doubt that if the little State of Rhode Island were tacked onto Massachusetts the Bay State would not have something to say about the policy of the consolidated Commonwealth? Does anyone believe that if New Hampshire and Vermont and Maine and Connecticut were to be hitched onto Massachusetts it would not change somewhat the policy of the men who represent those States? For this reason I feel that we should so divide the territory of the West that the Senators should come in contact with every different environment and not throw all into one Commonwealth, where the greatest interest can control all.

Oh, I hear it said that the Senators are bad folks. I do not know whether it is against the rules of this House to speak well of the Senate or not [laughter and applause], but I am going to make that attempt. I began to speak well of the Senate once before while I was on my feet, but either my time expired or I was called to order. There are some complaints that the Senators of the West do not represent enough people, and are therefore lacking in character, but I say to you that I would rather leave my political rights in the keeping of a Member of either House of Congress hailing from the Rocky Mountains and representing nothing but the sunset than to one standing in the shadow of a trust company and representing the unearned increment. [Applause.] Some gentlemen upon this floor would have us believe that the people of Arizona do not know their initiative from their referendum [applause], but all that the friends of that Territory ask is that these people may have the right to vote upon the propositions which so greatly affect them, thus shaping in some measure their own destiny, while demonstrating their fitness for self-government and their knowledge of affairs.

Now, what is the matter with the United States Senate, that some do not wish its numbers increased? I hold that there are to-day in the Senate men of just as high character and just as great ability as have ever sat in that House. If there is anything wrong, the wrong comes up from the people. The wrongs complained of are the result of the expensiveness of politics. If a man gets into a county office or a city office he is reached every time there is a subscription paper going around. A man getting a salary of $1,000 to $5,000 in a political office is presumed to subscribe to every charitable purpose on the same basis as a millionaire. The cause of wrong in the upper places in our Government, whether local or national, comes clear up from the bottom, the graft beginning with the garden seeds, and going up through our institutions to the top. If we want to make a United States Senator honest, if we want to make city officials honest, we must appeal to the American people to assist in making public life less expensive to them. [Laughter.]

How can we expect a United States Senator to maintain an Administration family of ten children on a salary of $5,000 a year and then subscribe from ten to a hundred dollars to some purpose every time he turns around? [Renewed laughter.] So, if there be evils in our public life, the evils do not begin at the top; they begin at the bottom, and it is up to the American people to remove the cause. If they want good government in Philadelphia and good government in Cincinnati they must not make political life expensive. It is all right to say that if a man can not afford the burdens he ought to get out of political life; but what is the logical result of such a course? It is to drive all poor men out of public life and to drive rich men into all public places within the gift of the people.

So I think I am getting at the very meat of the thing, so far as wrongdoing in public life is concerned, when I lay the blame at the door of the people themselves. They are not willful in this; it is mere thoughtlessness. They have not studied this problem, so it is due to some one to speak out, and, as usual, the duty falls on me.

My district is a little different from that of the rest of you. There is not another man in it who could be induced to come to Congress, because under Republican prosperity everybody is making so much money that no one is willing to quit the game. So they induced me to come and in a feeble way to represent them temporarily in this House. [Laughter.] They know also that if I had anything to give I would turn it over to them without asking, and so they have not tempted me in any way. I have no complaint to make about my own people. But I know how expensive it is to sit in the other House, and I have declined to go there on that account. [Great laughter.] How often has every man in the hearing of my voice heard it said, when some man aspired to the United States Senate: "How can he afford to go there? He is a poor man, is he not?" It should not be so in this country, that a poor man is excluded from any political office because of the burden imposed in holding it. I want to see it so that a poor man can come to Washington and lead the "simple life" and represent the people of the United States and make as good a Senator as any millionaire. And we shall do that "when the burdens are rolled away." [Laughter.] Just here I see my friend from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] looking at me and wondering just how expensive it is. [Great laughter.] I will give him a bill of particulars privately a little later on.

But I wish to read this one paragraph, a paragraph that was in the organic act making a Territory of Arizona. It says:

> That said government shall be maintained and continued until such time as the people residing in said Territory shall, with the consent of Congress, form a State government, republican in form, as prescribed in the Constitution of the United States, and apply for and obtain admission into the Union as a State on an equal footing with the original States.

That is in the original organic act creating the Territory of Arizona, and surely this House understands the obligation of a contract.

But again and again it is said that you can not raise folks enough out in Arizona to support a State government and two United States Senators. Why, gentlemen of the committee, if I were in Arizona I could take a street sprinkler and go out before breakfast and make a bigger oasis than all the agricultural lands in any of the States of New England. [Laughter.] Yet those States are prosperous and well governed. Arizona is going to have large tracts of irrigated lands, she is going to have vast mining interests, she is going ultimately to have manufacturing interests, and when finally admitted as a single State she will be one of the best Commonwealths in the Union. [Applause.]

I am merely making this talk to-day, Mr. Chairman, to have the country know that the statehood bill has not been entirely overlooked. I know that there is a conference committee at work upon it, but they have not told me what they are doing, and I want to know if they are going to bring back to this House an agreement and let Oklahoma with her 2,000,000 people come in. I want to know if they are going to make it possible to give free schools to the more than 100,000 children in the Indian Territory who are now schoolless.

I seldom fall into poetry, Mr. Chairman, and I am not a singer, but I have thought that if we do not admit Oklahoma to the Union a citizen of that Territory might well adapt the words of the old negro melody and say:

> My canoe is under water,
> And my banjo is unstrung;
> I am tired of living any more.
> My eyes shall look downward,
> And my song shall be unsung,
> While I stay on the Oklahoma shore.

[Laughter.]

Why, Oklahoma has to-day the same population as the original thirteen States had when they formed the Union, and yet we hesitate about admitting her. She has almost the population that overcame the onslaughts of the British Empire, and yet we hesitate about giving admission and statehood to that people who have been so patient.

But I shall not weary you. There are others to speak, and my time has almost expired. I merely wish to place myself on record and let the people of the West know where I stood while the conference committee was at work. [Laughter.]

And I hope that some day you will look a little more seriously upon the resolution which I introduced here this afternoon. You may think you can not form States in that way and admit them into the Union, but on a little reflection you will find such action is wholly within the Constitution of the United States. It is up to Texas to say, after we have given her permission, whether she will accept it or not, because she has the right now to divide into five States and come here with ten Senators. I have sometimes wondered how the people of this beautiful capital city would feel to see ten stalwart Texans with sombreros on their heads, their pants in their boots, and their guns in their belts, marching on Washington with the firm determination to blow out the gas. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I love the people of the South, and because I love them I am going to vote for their old subsidy, without thinking much more about it. [Laughter.] I am still going to send the daily papers there as fast as I can. And here, too, let me add that I am glad most of the Democrats have taken my advice of two years ago and have come over and voted for most of the Republican measures. I am glad that they made the election of the President so unanimous in 1904, in accordance with my request. [Laughter.] I owe them a great deal for accepting my advice, for I have given so much advice that has never been accepted by anyone else. And, in conclusion, I wish to say to my good brethern of the four States of Texas and all the South that I shall never weary of telling, in the words of one of our own sweet verse writers, Mr. Nesbitt, the story of—

Your flag and my flag and how it flies to-day,
In your land and my land and half a world away;
Rose red and blood red, its stripes forever gleam,
Snow white and soul white, the good forefathers' dream;
Sky blue and true blue, with stars that gleam aright,
The gloried guidon of the day, a shelter through the night.

Your flag and my flag, and oh, how much it holds!
Your land and my land secure within its folds;
Your heart and my heart beat quicker at the sight,
Sun kissed and wind tossed, the red and blue and white;
The one flag, the great flag, the flag for me and you,
Glorified all else beside, the red and white and blue.

[Prolonged applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNE]. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNE. Mr. Chairman, a bill will shortly be reported to this House making an appropriation in furtherance of the celebration, on and near the waters of Hampton Roads, in the State of Virginia, of the landing at Jamestown, May 13, 1607, of the first permanent English-speaking colony on this hemisphere. This object, sir, seems to me so worthy and important that I propose to give brief expression to some of the considerations that, in my opinion, justify the Government in participating in this commemoration. The sanction of Congress has indeed already been given to the enterprise by the act of March, 1905, in pursuance whereof all the great nations of the earth have accepted the invitation issued by the President of the United States to be represented there through their naval and military establishments.

It would be difficult, sir, to overestimate the significance of the event which it is thus proposed to celebrate. To be sure, the philosophy of our day, which has embraced in one generalization the law that rules mollusk and man, nature and nations, dust and doctrines, exhibits past events as so related in cause and effect that, strictly speaking, it is illogical to assign more importance to any one occurrence than to any other, the chain of causation being no stronger than its weakest link; and yet there is in some phenomena so dramatic a demonstration of their office as to make an exceptional appeal to the imagination. They sum up a long progress, or they mark so plainly the effect of unsuspected causes as to seem to be themselves the origin of a new departure. They have furnished opportunity to genius. If Charles I had not tried to rule England without a Parliament, Oliver Cromwell would not have been immortal. If the stamp act had never been passed, George Washington would have lived and died a plain Virginia planter. Such events have consecrated places to imperishable glory. I have stooped in the thick green grass of an English meadow and patted the turf with my hand because on a certain day, nearly seven hundred years before, it had seen the leagued barons and commonalty of England force from the necessities of a tyrannous king the priceless guaranties of Magna Charta. How many Americans have stood with bared heads and hearts devout in that severe, ungarnished old chamber in Philadelphia, finding it richer in suggestion than any august palace in the world, because its walls once echoed to the birth cry of the Republic, and heard our patriot fathers pledge their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor to the holy dangers of a just rebellion! In a similar spirit shall we turn our steps, in the May time of another year, toward the little island in the river James, peopled now only by memories, but dedicated forever to the respect and homage of mankind by its association with the advent upon this continent of those heroic souls who, three hundred years ago, braved the perils of the sea to raise their altars in a wilderness—

And be the fair beginning of a time.

The sublimest epic in human annals is the story of this continent since that October day in 1492 when the "inspired Genoese" first beheld with his physical vision the solid land of that "western world" he had so often visited in dreams. He had, though unsuspectingly, found a new world indeed—a theater for the unwinding of the great human drama whose preparatory action seemed to have exhausted the energies of the old. The history of Europe may be viewed in three parts—the process whereby the Roman Empire came into being, the story of that Empire to its fall, and the process whereby modern nations were formed out of its fragments. But here was a world that knew neither Rome nor fuedalism. Here the earth was cumbered with no débris of outworn institutions. The stage was empty. The settings indeed were waiting—richer, more varied, more bountiful in soil and product than any preceding stage had known. With the arrival of the first settlers at Jamestown the action of the drama commenced, and certainly no more momentous circumstance has ever been celebrated in this country than that which is the subject of this proposed observance.

The World's Fair at Chicago commemorated the discovery of America. But if that discovery had not been followed by the settlement of the New World by men of the right blood—heirs of the noblest traditions of civil liberty—no one can say by how many centuries the progress of mankind toward its ultimate goal must have been lengthened. At Philadelphia, in 1876, we marked with appropriate ceremony the completion of the first century of our national independence. But if the history of the thirteen colonies had not been made by precisely the men that did make it, the American Revolution would have been an impossibility. The Adamses, James Otis, George Washington, Patrick Henry, and Thomas Jefferson contended for nothing that had not been guaranteed to all English colonies in America as early as Gilbert's patent of 1578, renewed to Raleigh in 1584, in which the settlers were solemnly promised "all the privileges of free denizens and persons native of England, in such ample manner as if they were born and personally resident in our said realm of England."

The grantor of this patent, Elizabeth, the ablest and most virile of the Tudors, was fated not to see it in actual operation. When the settlement at Jamestown was made she had been dead four years, leaving in that splendid region stretching from Labrador to Florida not one English colonist, and aside from the annals of four unsuccessful expeditions to its shores, bequeathing to it nothing but the name which linked it forever with the pride and glory of England's virgin Queen.

But this central idea of the ancient patent was destined to prove an important factor in the political history of America. The great contest between absolutism and representative government which signalized the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in England had its analogue in the colonies, not less interesting and even more pregnant with influence upon the development of governmental institutions. Here the same struggle was made for the same liberties. Here the same arguments were addressed to the same object. Here the same appeals were made to the same ancient rights and immemorial traditions. For a hundred and fifty years the minds of men were more occupied with the fundamental principles of government than ever before in the history of the world. From their vantage point of observation 3,000 miles away the thoughtful leaders of America studied the momentous events that were passing in Europe, subjected them to examination in the light of the lessons of history and the commentaries of the great institutional writers, and compared them with their own contemporary experiences. The result was the development of a race of political thinkers. No other conditions can be imagined that would have produced the generation that gave us the Declaration of Independence, the essays of the Federalist, and the Constitution of the United States. I think it may safely be said that you may scan the entire field of history in vain in an attempt to find, not in one small community of less than 3,000,000 souls, but in all the world, a single generation that can furnish, in equal number and abilities, men to compare with George Washington, John and Samuel Adams, Thomas Jefferson, Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, John Jay, Patrick Henry, and John Marshall.

To the splendid fruitage of men and measures of this period the Old Dominion furnished a fertile soil. Massachusetts, the home of the town meeting, of the small farm, of the village community, and Virginia with her county system of government, her large plantations, and her manorial population, had much in common in their experiences with Crown and Parliament. Hand in hand they opposed a common resistance to a common tyranny. Without their combined leadership there could have been no union among the colonists, no revolution, no independence, no constitution. If the local democracies of New England offered the initial resistance to British tyranny, it was the hand of a great Virginian that formulated the justification of that resistance. At Boston James Otis declared that taxation without representation is tyranny. At Williamsburg Patrick Henry proclaimed that death is preferable to the loss of liberty. If Massachusetts produced in Samuel Adams the "organizer of the Revolution," Virginia furnished in George Washington the successful leader of its armies. If its first blood was shed upon the bosom of the old Bay State, it was upon the battlements of a Virginia fortress that were planted the banners of its final victory. [Applause.]

At Jamestown, on the 30th of July, 1619, assembled the first representative legislative body on this continent. From then till 1776 the House of Burgesses witnessed a great part of the parliamentary development out of which were to spring the institutions of the United States of America and, indirectly, the regenerative political movements elsewhere that have constituted the chief interest of the history of the world for a century and a quarter. One of the landmarks of the English constitution is the Petition of Right, passed by Parliament and assented to by King Charles I in June, 1628, whose most important provision was that "no freeman be required to give any gift, loan, benevolence, or tax without common consent by act of Parliament." Yet the House of Burgesses was even more jealous of the "immemorial rights of Englishmen" than was the British Parliament itself, for the substance of the Petition of Right is found in a statute of Virginia antedating it by nearly five years, which enacted that the governor should not "lay any taxes or imposts upon the colonists, their lands, or commodities otherway than by the authority of the General Assembly, to be levied and employed as the said General Assembly shall appoint." [Applause.]

This was an affirmation that, under the general prerogative of the Crown, the House of Burgesses was coordinate with Parliament, possessing for Virginia the same legislative capacity as that exercised by Parliament over the internal concerns of England. This doctrine was proclaimed by James I in a special message to Parliament, to the effect that the government of the colonies was the business of the King and the Privy Council, with which the Lords and Commons had nothing to do. At various times this same principle was declared in nearly every one of the other colonial legislatures. In 1774 Edmund Burke wrote that "by most solemn compacts" the Crown had erected the various colonies "into separate civil systems, with all the powers of distinct legislation and government; * * * distinct States dependent on the Crown, but not on the Parliament of England." The denial of this venerable and accepted constitutional doctrine by the English Parliament was the very point on which our forefathers made the Revolution turn—a doctrine embodied in the patent of Elizabeth, asserted by James I, admitted by Burke and Chatham, repeatedly announced by the legislative assemblies of the colonies, and by none with more frequency or emphasis than by the Virginia House of Burgesses.

This is not the place to recite with any particularity the history of that legislative body. But every American is proud of it. Time and again it was dissolved by royal governors for passing measures designed to enlarge political freedom and for expressing sympathy with the patriots of Massachusetts and others of the colonies. It was in the doorway of the House of Burgesses, which then sat in Williamsburg, that the young lawyer Thomas Jefferson was leaning one day in May, 1765, when Patrick Henry, the "forest-born Demosthenes," who seemed, as his listener has recorded, to speak as Homer wrote, thundered against the misgovernment of England that immortal philippic which, thrilling his hearers with patriotic fervor and arousing the heroic resistance of the colonists, has steeped the spirits of four generations of Americans in the inspiring eloquence of liberty. [Applause.] It was the burgesses who first appointed a committee of correspondence and recommended to the other colonies the appointing of similar committees, whose work was of such incalculable benefit to the Revolution in the period just preceding the outbreak of hostilities. It was the burgesses also who, in the very first year after the Declaration of Independence, and under the leadership of its author, struck from under the fabric of a landed aristocracy the buttresses of primogeniture and entail.

Much has been said, sir, at various times on the theme of Cavalier and Puritan; much fanciful analogy has passed for sociology, and much interesting legend has been recounted for history. It is undoubtedly true that the early settlers of Virginia were preponderantly of those who in England had been on the side of royal prerogative and established church, while the colonizers of Massachusetts were mainly "Parliament men" and of the reformed religion. But in each case there was a considerable minority infusion that served to modify the complexion of the body politic and to prepare the way for a mutual understanding and cooperation when, in the fullness of time, such a consummation should be demanded by a destiny they were as unable to foresee as they were powerless to resist it. Subjected to practically the same necessities of self-regulation, oppressed by the same tyranny, exploited and outraged by the same blundering policies of the ruling classes of England, they both were slowly but surely molded into the inexorable elements of a great democratic state. In the fervent words of that great southron, Henry W. Grady, who, alas, like Lycidas, "is dead and hath not left his peer:"

> Neither Puritan nor Cavalier long survived as such. The virtues and good traditions of both happily still live for the inspiration of their sons and the saving of the old fashion. But both Puritan and Cavalier were lost in the storm of the first Revolution, and the American citizen, supplanting both and stronger than either, took possession of the Republic bought by their common blood and fashioned to wisdom, and charged himself with teaching men government and establishing the voice of the people as the voice of God.

Ah! Mr. Chairman, in a day when the minds of people are chiefly occupied with statistics of wealth and area and power, it is well for us to remember what, after all, constitutes at once the source and the guaranty of true national glory. In the light of the inspiring history of the last three hundred years we may read the answer to the poet's question:

> What constitutes a state?
> Not high-raised battlement or labored mound,
> Thick wall or moated gate;
> Not cities proud with spires and turrets crowned;
> Not bays and broad-armed ports,
> Where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride;
> Not starred and spangled courts,
> Where low-browed baseness wafts perfume to pride;
> No; men, high-minded men.
> Men who their duties know,
> But know their rights, and knowing, dare maintain,
> Prevent the long-aimed blow,
> And crush the tyrant while they rend the chain;
> These constitute a state.

[Applause.]

"Three hundred years" seems a long time as we speak the words; yet in the life of nations it is but a little while. "Why," said Thoreau, speaking of the time that had elapsed since creation, according, I suppose, to Bishop Upshur's Chronology, "why, sixty old women like Nabby Kettle, taking hold of hands, would span the whole of it. They would be but a small tea party, but their gossip would make universal history." There are five Members of this House that could clasp hands and unite the settlement of Jamestown with this proposed celebration. The present Senators from two of the States in the Union could compass the interval with ten years to spare. Three hundred years! From the birth of Christ to the persecution of Diocletian. From the battle of Hastings to the expedition of the Black Prince in aid of Peter the Cruel. From the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope to the treaty of Campo Formio. Never has a period of similar duration witnessed such transformation and such progress as that whose close is to be so appropriately commemorated at Jamestown in May of the coming year; in military organization and equipment, in naval architecture and armament, and in the whole domain of industry, it would be impossible to cite a parallel. Nor could there be found a place in all America so apt to an impressive demonstration of this marvelous change as the fair domain of old Virginia. [Applause.]

If, sir, it be true, as Goethe says, that no man deserves liberty who will not win it day by day anew, those who dwell upon that sacred soil must feel their long inheritance of sacrifice to be a dedication to the noblest ideals of citizenship. That soil, sir, was fertilized in the cause of civilization by the blood of the early colonists and their savage foes. In that cause it has produced an abundant harvest of historic deeds. Upon that soil were fought the last battle of the Revolution, which established our nationality, and the last battle of the civil war, which preserved it. There our foreign military visitors may view the scenes of some of the most memorable performances in the long history of war. At Yorktown, in the finishing blow of the contest for independence, Washington concluded one of the most brilliant of those achievements that have given him rank among the illustrious captains of history. Scarcely second to the New Jersey campaign, which Frederick the Great pronounced the greatest campaign of the century, was that magnificent strategy which kept Clinton shut up in New York until the American Army, swinging loose from its base, fairly hurled itself 500 miles upon the beleaguered Cornwallis. [Applause.]

Time would fail, sir, if I were to attempt a mere recital of that long series of battles, sieges, and military exploits in which, from Bull Run to Appomattox, the best blood of North and South reddened in common sacrifice the fields of old Virginia, expiating together a national error and cementing the half-sundered bonds of union in a nationality stronger than before, which, please God, shall be henceforth forever as safe from dissension within as it is secure against assault from without. [Applause.]

A reunited country finds at last a common heritage in the memories of Gordon and Sheridan, Longstreet and Sherman, Lee and Grant. The heroes of Cold Harbor and Fredericksburg in blue and gray clasp fraternal hands at their memorial bivouacs. If any rancor long survived from the fierce clash of passions in that fratricidal strife, it disappeared when the imperious voice of Columbia ordered from this hemisphere the mediæval tyranny of Spain and Americans of North and South rallied once again under the banners of the Republic against a foreign foe. [Applause.] There could be no stronger evidence of final peace than was afforded recently when that great cavalry leader of the South, whose youth was so unreservedly devoted to his section, whose middle life was absorbed in conscientious service in this House, whose age found him again in the saddle, but under the Stars and Stripes, and whose dearest wish it had been that he might die in a Federal uniform, was laid to rest, with tributes of affection from all his countrymen, upon the storied heights of Arlington.

This peace, sir, let no man disturb. The contest between the sections bequeathed to the South a problem of greater importance, of greater delicacy, of greater difficulty, than any other people have yet been compelled to solve in all the history of the world. That solution it must be left to them to find and to apply. [Applause.] They bear its chief burden. They dwell among its dangers. They have the experience necessary to deal with it. He would be but a poor champion of his country's peace, or even of the welfare of those whose cause he claimed to espouse, who should, by untimely interference and unskillful meddling, be responsible for raising a spirit that he could not

But, sir, if the soil of Virginia be rich in association, the waters are scarcely less so. When the proudest ships of all the great navies of the world are lying off Hampton Roads they will be near the spot where, in March, 1862, occurred an event which revolutionized naval warfare and determined the type of all subsequent naval construction. Since the memorable battle between the Merrimac and the Monitor scarcely a wooden ship of war has been built, and every vessel at the celebration will be only visiting the home of its ancestors. A greater change in the construction, equipment, armament, and operation of fighting ships has taken place in that interval of forty-four years than had occurred between that time and the battle of Lepanto, in 1571. The transition in type and effectiveness has probably been greater than between Lepanto and the fight at "sea-girt Salamis," 480 B. C. A Macedonian phalanx would be no more helpless against a company of American sharpshooters armed with Krag-Jörgensen rifles than would Spain's "invincible Armada," which threatened the very existence of England in 1588, before a modern battle squadron. Indeed, I believe that one ship like the Alabama or the Oregon could annihilate, substantially without harm to itself or crew, in one action in the open sea, all the vessels that Don John and the Turks brought together at Lepanto, the Spanish Armada, and all the naval forces at the command of both North and South in the civil war.

It will be an inspiring and awesome spectacle—that naval parade in the Virginia waters. The world will never have seen before such gathered potency of havoc on the sea. The boast of the British navy will be there, proud in its defense of a realm on which the sun never sets, an empire comprising quite one-fifth part of all the earth, calm in the confidence inspired by its heroic traditions and by its numerical strength in ships and men, but chastened, let us hope, to some extent by the recollections of the Revolution and the war of 1812. [Applause.] The pride of the navy of France will be there, second in statistical rank, and conscious of its ancient association in a common cause with us. There shall float the noble ships of Germany, bristling with their Kaiser's purpose and ambiguous of prophecy. There, too, shall wave the pennant of old Spain, suggestive of a glory that once enthralled two hemispheres, still sore from the merciful wound our destiny compelled us to inflict, but largely comforted by the consciousness of new-found and promising national impulses. Italy will be represented there by vessels worthy to recall her splendid past when the Roman triremes swept the Mediterranean, or the "Queen of the Adriatic" collected tribute over a thousand leagues of sea. The flags of Norway and Sweden shall bring to mind the moving legends of the northern ocean, of the valorous deeds of the restless Vikings, and of that dauntless Lief Ericsson, who, five centuries before Columbus, was the first—

> To sail beyond the sunset and the baths
> Of all the western stars.

There, too, the breezes shall unfurl the standards of the Rising Sun, and the trophied monsters of great Togo's fleet shall seem like the emanations of a conjuror's dream, so little a while ago it is since Perry, with every cannon port of his flagship closed and with an open Bible resting above the Stars and Stripes draped over the capstan head, knocked at the door of isolated, feudal, and oriental Japan. Russia, defeated, humiliated, will not let us forget her former friendship, but will send to Hampton Roads war ships both reminiscent of the navy she has lost and also, let us hope and believe, prophetic of a new navy that shall represent, not the aggressive programme of a military autocracy, but the self-contained and national policy of a great people soon to be clothed in the full panoply of self-government. [Applause.] The ensign of Holland will be no stranger on the waters of the western world, recalling the age of her maritime prosperity and power, when the Dutch, the "carriers of the ocean and the harvesters of the sea," founded New Netherlands upon the Hudson, and when stout old Van Tromp, with a broom at his masthead, plowed the English Channel and harried the river Thames.

And, sir, above the finest ships that ride in that magnificent harbor Old Glory shall unfold [applause]; the emblem of the most powerful and most peaceful people in the world. Ship for ship, gun for gun, man for man, let me ask, not in idle boasting, but in very truth, where is the navy to compare with the Navy of the United States? Indeed, regard being had for the modern character of our vessels, their condition of fitness and preparedness, and the alertness, initiative, and drilled skill of the man not only "behind the gun," but also behind the machinery, there are men, far better qualified to speak on the subject than I am, who believe that our Navy could encounter to-day, with reasonable hope of victory, any other navy on the seas. And, I may add, if this sentiment were universally entertained it would constitute the strongest imaginable guaranty of the world's peace. [Applause.]

An American may well be forgiven, sir, if he grow somewhat unrestrained in speech when the subject is the Navy. Short as our history is, it has witnessed deeds in war upon the sea, and on our Great Lakes and rivers, which for bravery and heroism may challenge comparison with any recorded in all the crowded annals of the past. Greater daring no mortal man ever exhibited than did Decatur under the walls of Tripoli, Cushing in destroying the Albemarle, or Hobson and his companions at the mouth of Santiago Harbor.

Nor need we fear when the long roll of great sea captains is to be called. England, to be sure, draws heavily on the immortals with her Drake, and Hawk, and Jervis, and Hood, and Rodney, and Nelson; but even in such company there will be found place for Barry, for John Paul Jones [applause], and Lawrence, and Perry, and Farragut, and Dewey, and Schley. [Applause.] We, too, can quote as mottoes of duty the sayings of our naval heroes. Nelson, at Copenhagen, when Admiral Parker signaled a retreat, exclaimed: "Damn the signal! I am blind in one eye and can not see it." Said Farragut at Mobile: "Damn the torpedoes! Full speed ahead." Nelson's last words at Trafalgar, "Thank God, I have done my duty," are not so well known as the dying Lawrence's admonition, "Don't give up the ship." Long after the establishment of universal peace, when navies shall have ceased to vex the bosom of the sea, men will repeat the words of John Paul Jones, when, amid the wreckage and the dead and dying on the deck of his sinking ship, he answered the demand of the captain of the Serapis to surrender. "Surrender!" he exclaimed, "I have just begun to fight."

But no change has been more marked in these three hundred years than that which has taken place in the industry of the Old Dominion. In addition to the revolution in the useful arts, due to the development of the natural sciences, and especially of steam and electricity, which has been inconceivably beyond all precedent, but in which Virginia and the South have participated as a matter of course with the rest of the world, that section has undergone a succession of changes peculiar to itself of surpassing interest in manner, incident, and results. This phenomenon would repay extensive treatment, but must not long detain us upon this occasion. The specialization in products like tobacco, cotton, and sugar, under the application of servile labor had built up what Grady has called "a splendid and chivalric oligarchy," with attendant economic implications wholly at variance with the general tendencies and progress of society elsewhere. When the civil war was ended chaos fell upon the South. The tattered and shattered heroes who stacked their useless arms before the magnanimous victor of Appomattox, turned from the wreck of their separatist dream to a disrupted and disorganized society, to wasted fields and ruined towns burdened with hopeless debt, to bankrupt business, blighted homes, and exhausted energies.

But the men and women of the South were made of the stuff that surmounts even impossibilites. If ever vindication be needed for the American character, for its moral resilience, its fundamental stability, its resistless energy, its practical capacity, its unconquerable courage, that vindication will be found in the record, without precedent or parallel, which exhibits the social and material conquests made by the Southern States since the civil war; indeed, mainly within the last twenty-five years. [Applause.] Within this time the railroad mileage of the South has grown from 20,600 to over 60,000, or about 200 per cent; the assessed valuation of property from $3,050,000,000 to $6,500,000,000, or more than 100 per cent; the annual value of farm products from $660,000,000 to $1,750,000,000, or 166 per cent. Exports have increased from $261,000,000 to $555,000,000; manufactured products from $457,000,000 to $1,750,000,000, an increase of 80 per cent greater than even the tremendous gain in farm values; the cotton crop from $314,000,000 to $680,000,000; the number of barrels of petroleum produced from 179,000 to 42,500,000. In 1880 the South had invested in cotton mills $21,000,000; to-day $250,000,000. These mills then used 225,000 bales of cotton as against 2,225,000 used to-day.

Meantime the yearly manufacture of pig iron has grown from 397,000 tons to about 3,500,000 tons, and the coal mined from 6,000,000 tons to more than 70,000,000 tons. The South to-day has about $30,000,000 more invested in cotton mills than the entire country had in such investment in 1880, although its population is some eight millions less than the total population of the country at that time. It produces annually $60,000,000 worth more of lumber than did the whole United States in 1880.

These figures, startling as they are, do not exhibit fully the phenomenal advance of the Southern States in wealth and industrial independence. To-day that progress is in midcareer. No man dare put estimated limits to it; but I believe it safe to say that we are not yet at its flood tide, and that for the next generation at least the development of the South is to be the characteristic feature of our national history.

Sir, when the citizens of the various sections of our common country shall meet next year at Jamestown, it will be to survey a most amazing record of accomplishment. The little settlement of 1607 grew into a populous and prosperous colony. The colony was reborn as a State in the first great federal, representative republic in the history of the world, whose liberties Virginians did more to define and achieve, and whose government Virginians did more to frame and establish, than any other men. Setting an example to her sister colonies, Virginia early conveyed to the common interest her claims to that vast northwestern region out of which so many other Commonwealths have since been carved and admitted into the Union of States, after having been dedicated by solemn compact through the efforts of her great son, Thomas Jefferson, to freedom, morality, and education forever.

That Union spread southward to the Mexican border and westward to the Pacific Sea. It has grown in population, wealth, influence, and power until it is recognized all round the globe as the most potent force at work upon the fortunes of mankind. Its institutions have re-formed the governments of the world. They have three times occasioned fundamental political changes in the English Parliament. They have caused five hundred written constitutions to be made and modeled on our own. They have confederated Italy and Germany and amalgamated the British Empire. They have set up legislative assemblies over all Europe. They have spread trial by jury, religious toleration, freedom of the press, and liberty of speech. They have invaded the custom-bound isolation of the Orient and set up a constitutional system in Japan. They have initiated the movement for self-government in Russia that henceforth can not be defeated or seriously impeded until the voice of the Russian people shall have become supreme in the control of their own affairs.

Impressed with these reflections, sir, it will not be difficult for Americans to rededicate themselves to those great fundamental and characteristic principles of liberty and justice on which their past glory has been reared, on which their present prosperity and power depend, and on which their future security and progress must be builded. Graver problems remain, indeed, than any yet so triumphantly solved—questions of international safety, of domestic peace, of industrial righteousness. I believe it is only by undertaking their solution in the old-fashioned serious, honest, liberty-loving, justice-doing American spirit that we may hope to achieve results answerable to our past and responsive to our high destiny.

Let us, therefore, when the spring shall come again, gather in old Virginia about the earliest altar erected to our civic worship in this brave New World, and there, Americans all, take upon our lips again the holy natal vows of our peculiar nationality, strong in the hope and resolute in the purpose that, in the words of John Adams to Thomas Jefferson, "Our pure, virtuous, public-spirited, federative Republic shall last forever, govern the globe, and introduce the perfection of man." [Loud applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16953—the Post-Office appropriation bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 11129. An act granting an increase of pension to Thomas J. Lindsey;

H. R. 11536. An act granting an increase of pension to James D. Hudson;

H. R. 20. An act to change and fix the time for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the middle district of Tennessee, in the southern division of the eastern district of Tennessee at Chattanooga, and the northeastern division of the eastern district of Tennessee at Greeneville, and for other purposes;

H. R. 8717. An act for the relief of Jacob Pickens;

H. R. 15328. An act to approve certain final proofs in the Chamberlain land district, South Dakota; and

H. R. 4461. An act to provide for the abatement of nuisances in the District of Columbia by the Commissioners of said District, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 535. An act to amend and reenact section 1 of charter 27 of volume 27 of the United States Statutes at Large, being "An act to provide for a term of the United States circuit and district courts at Evanston, Wyo.," approved May 23, 1892.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 5498. An act granting additional lands from the Fort Douglas Military Reservation to the University of Utah—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 1344. An act for the relief of John M. Burks—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 3245. An act creating the Mesa Verde National Park—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 4256. An act for the relief of the Alaska Short Line Railway and Navigation Company's Railroad—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. KLINE, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for ten days, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the Post-Office appropriation bill close at 4 o'clock to-morrow, except that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] may have one hour, from 2 to 3 o'clock on Thursday, to address the committee as in general debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to close general debate on the post-office appropriation bill at 4 o'clock to-morrow, and adds thereto the request that on Thursday next, from 2 to 3 o'clock, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] may address the committee as in general debate. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the bishop of Washington requesting the appointment of a chaplain at Washington Barracks and recommending the same—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of St. Croix River, Minnesota and Wisconsin—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. WANGER, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 4250) to further enlarge the powers and authority of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service and to impose further duties thereon, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 3161); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bills of the House H. R. 178 and 7094, reported in lieu thereof a bill (H. R. 17983) providing for the erection of a monument on Kings Mountain battle ground commemorative of the great victory gained there during the war of the American Revolution, on October 7, 1780, by the American forces, accompanied by a report (No. 3162); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 12710) permitting the St. Louis, San Francisco and New Orleans Railroad Company (formerly the Arkansas and Choctaw Railway Company), the St. Louis and Oklahoma City Railroad Company, the St. Louis, Oklahoma and Southern Railway Company, and the Oklahoma City and Western Railroad Company, and each or either of them, to sell and convey their railroads and other property in the Indian Territory to the St. Louis and San Francisco Railroad Company, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 3158); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. BARTLETT, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 17945) authorizing the Borderland Coal Company to construct a bridge across Tug Branch of Big Sandy River; reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 3159); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 11, 1906.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. NELSON, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF BIRTH OF BENJAMIN FRANKLIN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Pursuant to the concurrent resolution of Congress accepting the invitation of the American Philosophical Society, of Philadelphia, Pa., to attend the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Benjamin Franklin, the Chair appoints Mr. LODGE, Mr. KEAN, Mr. BURKETT, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. FOSTER, and Mr. LATIMER as the committee on the part of the Senate.

USELESS PAPERS IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Auditor for the Treasury Department relative to useless documents, papers, etc., on the files of the Treasury Department, and requesting that certain telegrams referred to in the letter from the Auditor be included with the schedules heretofore transmitted to Congress; which was read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair appoints as members on the part of the Senate of the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments the Senator from Alabama, Mr. PETTUS, and the Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. GALLINGER. Without objection, the communication and accompanying papers will be printed and referred to the joint select committee.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12843) to amend the seventh section of the act entitled "An act to establish circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

S. 535. An act to amend and reenact section 1 of chapter 27 of volume 27 of the United States Statutes at Large, being "An act to provide for a term of the United States circuit and district courts at Evanston, Wyo.," approved May 23, 1892;

H. R. 20. An act to change and fix the time for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the middle district of Tennessee, in the southern division of the eastern district of Tennessee at Chattanooga, and the northeastern division of the eastern district of Tennessee at Greeneville, and for other purposes;

H. R. 4461. An act to provide for the abatement of nuisances in the District of Columbia by the Commissioners of said District, and for other purposes;

H. R. 11129. An act granting an increase of pension to Thomas J. Lindsey;

H. R. 11536. An act granting an increase of pension to James D. Hudson; and

H. R. 15328. An act to approve certain final proofs in the Chamberlain land district, South Dakota.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MARTIN presented petitions of Weems Council, No. 100, of Weems; of Ideal Council, No. 71, of Norfolk; of Grove Council, No. 40, of Howards Grove; of May Council, No. 31, of Richmond; of Peninsula Council, No. 125, of Hampton; of Fairmont Council, No. 70, of Fairmont; of Hallwood Council, No. 150, of Hallwood; of Washington Memorial Council, No. 2, of Norfolk; of Massanutten Council, No. 68, of Toms Brook, and of Enterprise Council, No. 9, of Richmond, all of the Junior Order of United American Mechanics, in the State of Virginia, praying for the enactment of legislation to restrict immigration; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. MORGAN. I present a resolution of the legislature of the State of Illinois, passed May 5, 1903, which I ask to have read and that it lie on the table.

There being no objection, the Secretary read as follows:

Whereas more than 300 American citizens now residents of the Isle of Pines, said American citizens owning more than one-half of the total territory of said island, have memorialized Congress for relief from the present government of the said Isle of Pines, and are praying that the islands be retained by the Government as a part of the territory of the United States; and

Whereas the United States Government continued the present government of the said Isle of Pines as a de facto government to formulate a new and better government for the island until the island of Cuba was turned over to the Cuban Government; and

Whereas the Isle of Pines was ceded to the United States Government by Spain, and the Platt amendment omitted the said Isle of Pines from the proposed constitutional boundaries of Cuba, and the Secretary of War for the United States has placed the Isle of Pines within the constitutional boundaries of Cuba contrary to the wishes of the Americans there resident; and

Whereas the said 300 American citizens are colonists from the United States, who have built permanent homes and made other improvements on said Isle of Pines in the reasonable belief that it was to continue to be territory of the United States, and such American citizens are entitled to the protection of the United States Government and desire to live under the flag of this country: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate of the forty-third general assembly (the house concurring herein), That it is the sense of the general assembly of the State of Illinois that the said Isle of Pines be permanently retained as territory of the United States.

Resolved further, That the secretary of the senate and the clerk of the house be, and they are hereby, instructed to forward to the United States Senators and Congressmen from Illinois a copy of these resolutions.

Adopted by the senate May 5, 1903.

Concurred in by the house May 7, 1903.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the resolution be printed as a document, and that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KITTREDGE presented a petition of Camp Rahskopf of the National Society of the Philippines, of Aberdeen, S. Dak., praying for the enactment of legislation providing special medals to all officers and enlisted men who served beyond their legal enlistment for the war with Spain; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PENROSE presented a petition of the East End Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Pittsburg, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Territories of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the congregation of Christ's Evangelical Lutheran Church, of Milton, Pa., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for an extension of time in the interstate transportation of live stock; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. WARREN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Wheatland, Wyo., praying for the removal of the internal-revenue tax on denaturized alcohol; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5151) for the adjudication of the claim of Henry A. V. Post by the Court of Claims, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was recommitted on February 27, 1906, the bill (S. 1604) to amend the act of March 2, 1903, increasing the pensions of those who have lost limbs or been totally disabled in them in the military or naval service of the United States, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

ALLOTMENTS TO NATIVES OF ALASKA.

Mr. NELSON. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5537) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to allot homesteads to the natives of Alaska, to report it favorably with amendments, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments of the Committee on Public Lands were, in line 11, to strike out the word "forever;" in the same line, after the word "nontaxable," to insert "until otherwise provided by Congress;" and in line 13, after the word "right," to strike out the words "over any other claimant;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered, in his discretion and under such rules as he may prescribe, to allot not to exceed 160 acres of nonmineral land in the district of Alaska to any Indian or Eskimo of full or mixed blood who resides in and is a native of said district, and who is the head of a family, or is 21 years of age; and the land so allotted shall be deemed the homestead of the allottee and his heirs in perpetuity, and shall be inalienable and nontaxable until otherwise provided by Congress. Any person qualified for an allotment as aforesaid shall have the preference right to secure by allotment the nonmineral land occupied by him not exceeding 160 acres.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND IN JOHNSON COUNTY, WYO.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 16521) directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell and convey a certain parcel of land to Johnson County, Wyo., and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is an obvious mistake in the bill. It says "north of" in describing. The word "of" should be stricken out.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I did not notice it in the reading of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is merely a mistake in the construction of the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Secretary please read the description?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as requested, the entire bill being as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to sell and convey to the county of Johnson, in the State of Wyoming, for a poor farm, the following-described tract of land, to wit: The northeast quarter of the northwest quarter and the north half of the northeast quarter of section 8, and the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 9, in township 50 north of range 82 west, upon the payment by the said county of the sum of $1.25 per acre for the said lands.

Mr. HEYBURN. It says "north of." The word "of" should come out.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Is not that correct?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; it is not correct.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There is a comma after the word "north," is there not?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; the ranges run the other way.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask leave to insert a comma after the word "north," in line 9; so as to read "in township 50 north, of range 82 west."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That correction will be made.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION AS TO SPONGES.

Mr. BACON. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back with an amendment, in the nature of a substitute, the bill (S. 4806) to prohibit the use of diving apparatus in the taking of sponges, and I submit a report thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the same.

The Secretary read the amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful to land, deliver, cure, or offer for sale at any port or place in the United States any sponges taken by means of diving or diving apparatus from the waters of the Gulf of Mexico or Straits of Florida: Provided, That sponges taken or gathered by such process between October 1 and May 1 of each year in a greater depth of water than 50 feet shall not be subject to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That every person guilty of a violation of this act shall for each offense be liable to a fine of not less than $100 or more than $500, which fine shall be a lien against the vessel on which the offense was committed. And every vessel used or employed in violation of this act shall be liable to a fine of not less than $100 or more than $500 or forfeiture, and shall be seized and proceeded against by process of libel in any court having jurisdiction of the offense.

SEC. 3. That any violation of this act shall be prosecuted in the district court of the United States of the district wherein the offense was committed.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to enforce the provisions of this act, and upon his request the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Navy may employ the vessels of the Revenue-Cutter Service and of the Navy, respectively, to that end.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill just read?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill to regulate the landing, delivery, cure, and sale of sponges."

LANDS IN MONTANA.

Mr. CARTER. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 17135) providing that the State of Montana be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was, on page 3, after line 6, to insert:

SEC. 2. That subject to rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, the owner in fee simple or a claimant under any general or special law of the United States, of any land included within the limits of the Red Rock Lakes reservoir site, in the State of Montana, as the said reservoir is now or may hereafter be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, the lands described in the preceding section being a part of said reservoir site, may at the option of the owner or claimant relinquish or convey such land included in said reservoir site to the United States and personally select in lieu thereof an equal area of the nontimbered public lands of the United States subject to homestead entry and situated in the State of Montana, and such owner or claimant shall be placed in the same relation as to the United States to the title, possession, and right of possession of the lieu land thus selected as such owner or claimant sustained to the land relinquished at the time the relinquishment was made.

Change section 2 to section 3.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NEWLANDS introduced a bill (S. 5664) to authorize the United States Government to participate in the international exposition to be held at Milan, Italy, during the year 1906, and to appropriate money in aid thereof; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Select Committee on Industrial Expositions.

AMENDMENT TO POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices to $1,201,265.84, so as to include San Francisco among the cities where such service shall be used, intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

DISPOSAL OF TIMBER ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. PILES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 5327) to provide for the disposal of timber on public lands chiefly valuable for timber, and for other purposes; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. HEYBURN. I submit an amendment to the rate bill and ask that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amend section 9 of said act by striking out therefrom the following words: "but such person or persons shall not have the right to pursue both of said remedies, and must in each case elect which one of the two methods of procedure herein provided for he or they will adopt;" so that the section will read as follows:

"SEC. 9. That any person or persons claiming to be damaged by any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act may either make complaint to the Commission as hereinafter provided for, or may bring suit in his or their own behalf for the recovery of the damages for which such common carrier may be liable under the provisions of this act, in any district or circuit court of the United States of competent jurisdiction. In any such action brought for the recovery of damages the court before which the same shall be pending may compel any director, officer, receiver, trustee, or agent of the corporation or company defendant in such suit to attend, appear, and testify in such case, and may compel the production of the books and papers of such corporation or company party to any such suit; the claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such witness from testifying, but such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

APPALACHIAN AND WHITE MOUNTAINS FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On March 9 I reported from the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game the bill (S. 4953) for the purpose of acquiring national forest reserves in the Appalachian Mountains and White Mountains, to be known as the "Appalachian Forest Reserve" and the "White Mountain Forest Reserve," respectively. I now submit a written report to accompany the bill, and ask that 2,500 additional copies of the report, with accompanying map, be printed for the use of the Senate.

There being no objection, the order was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That 2,500 additional copies of Report No. 2537, to accompany the bill (S. 4953) for the purpose of acquiring national forest reserves in the Appalachian Mountains and White Mountains, to be known as the "Appalachian Forest Reserve" and the "White Mountain Forest Reserve," respectively, with the accompanying map, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As to the bill (S. 4953) for the purpose of acquiring national forest reserves in the Appalachian Mountains and White Mountains, to be known as the "Appalachian Forest Reserve" and the "White Mountain Forest Reserve," respectively, there is such a widespread interest in its provisions that the printed number of copies has become exhausted. I ask that 1,000 additional copies of the bill be printed.

There being no objection, the order was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That 1,000 additional copies of the bill (S. 4953) for the purpose of acquiring national forest reserves in the Appalachian Mountains and White Mountains, to be known as the "Appalachian Forest Reserve" and the "White Mountain Forest Reserve," respectively, be printed for the use of the Senate.

COAL ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. NEWLANDS. On the 29th ultimo I introduced a bill (S. 5441) authorizing the President to reserve coal and lignite underlying public lands for future disposal, and asked that it lie on the table subject to my call. I now move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

MONONGAHELA RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9324) to authorize the Fayette Bridge Company to construct a bridge over the Monongahela River, Pennsylvania, from a point in the borough of Brownsville, Fayette County, to a point in the borough of West Brownsville, Washington County.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 5, to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 6. That any bridge built under this act and subject to its limits shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transportation over the same of the mails, troops, and munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile for the transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to said bridge, and it shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-roads in the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, my colleague [Mr. PATTERSON] has been called home and will be gone for two or three weeks. He asks to be relieved from further service upon the conference committee on the statehood bill and that some one be appointed in his place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] will be excused from further service as a conferee on the part of the Senate upon the statehood bill. The Chair appoints in his place the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

SOUTHERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12863) to create a new division of the southern judicial district of Texas, and to provide terms of court at Victoria, and for other purposes.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 4, after the word "Refugio," to insert the words "Aransas, San Patricio;" so as to read:

That the counties of Bee, Calhoun, Dewitt, Goliad, Jackson, Live Oak, Refugio, Aransas, San Patricio, and Victoria shall constitute a division of the southern judicial district of Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, on page 2, line 8, after the word "civil," to strike out the words "or criminal;" and in line 9, after the word "pending," to insert "or any criminal offense committed;" to as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That all civil process issued against persons resident in the above-named counties and cognizable before said courts shall be issued out of and made returnable to said courts at Victoria, and that all prosecutions against persons for offenses committed in any of said counties shall be tried in said courts at Victoria: Provided, That no civil cause begun and pending or any criminal offense committed prior to the passage of this act shall be in any way affected by it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 2, line 15, after the word "business," to strike out the semicolon, insert a period, and to strike out the remainder of the bill, in the following words:

Provided, That suitable rooms and accommodations shall be furnished for holding of said courts, at said place, free of expense to the Government of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION AS TO SPONGES.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 4805) to prohibit aliens from taking or gathering sponges in the waters of the United States.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment, on page 1, line 9, after the words "United States," to strike out the comma and the words "within one marine league of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, rivers, or harbors of the United States;" so as to read:

That it shall be unlawful for any person not a citizen of the United States, or who has not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States in the manner provided by law, to gather, take, or attempt to gather or take, any sponges of any kind or species whatsoever, in any of the waters of the United States, or in any of the waters within the jurisdiction of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I propose certain amendments, which I send to the desk and ask the Secretary to read them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments proposed by the Senator from Florida will be stated in their order.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 4, after the word "States," strike out all down to and including the words "by law," in line 6, and insert "either as principal, agent, or employee;" so as to read:

That it shall be unlawful for any person not a citizen of the United States, either as principal, agent, or employee, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 20, after the word "Labor," strike out all down to and including the words "United States," in line 24, and insert "shall have the power to authorize any officer or agent of the Department of Commerce and Labor, and, through the Secretary of the Treasury, any officer of the customs service or of the Revenue-Cutter Service, and, through the Secretary of the Navy, any officer of the Navy;" so as to read:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall have the power to authorize any officer or agent of the Department of Commerce and Labor, and, through the Secretary of the Treasury, any officer of the customs service or of the Revenue-Cutter service, and, through the Secretary of the Navy, any officer of the Navy to search and seize any foreign vessel and arrest any person violating, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EUNICE TRIPLER.

Mr. BURKETT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3820) for the relief of Eunice Tripler.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CULLOM. Has that bill been reported by a committee, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has been reported by a committee.

Mr. CULLOM. By what committee, if I may ask?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was reported by the Committee on Claims. Is there objection to its present consideration?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 5, after the words "sum of," to strike out "ten" and insert "three;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be paid to Eunice Tripler, widow of Surg. Charles S. Tripler, United States Army, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,000, for services by the said Charles S. Tripler in his lifetime in preparing, superintending, and directing the publication of a manual for the use of medical officers of the Army of the United States: Provided, That payment of the above sum shall be a bar to any further claim against the Government for the use of the book herein referred to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PATENTS TO LAND FOR CEMETERY PURPOSES.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9165) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent to the Scandinavian Evangelical Lutheran Little Missouri River congregation to certain lands for cemetery purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent to the Scandinavian Evangelical Lutheran Little Missouri River congregation, for cemetery purposes, to the following-described land, to wit: The southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 12, in township 15 north, of range 1 east, of the Black Hills meridian, in the county of Butte and State of South Dakota, containing an area of 10 acres of land, the patent to contain the provision that the land shall be used for cemetery purposes only; but the association shall pay $1.25 per acre therefor.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN T. IRION.

Mr. FRAZIER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13154) for the relief of John T. Irion.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I do not wish now to interpose any objection to the passage of these bills, as it seems there is no reason why they should not be passed; but I must have the conference report in regard to the bill relative to the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory considered this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report to which the Senator from Minnesota refers is a privileged report.

Mr. CLAPP. I so understand, and I trust that we shall get through with the consideration of the bills which Senators are calling up from the Calendar in a very few moments.

Mr. FRAZIER. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that the bill for which I ask consideration will occupy but a few moments.

Mr. CLAPP. Very well; I am not objecting to that bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill named by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. FRAZIER]?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $180 to enable the Postmaster-General to reimburse John T. Irion, late postmaster at Paris, Tenn., the amount paid by him under authority of the Post-Office Department for rent of post-office accommodations in the town of Paris, Tenn., during the year 1888.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN H. HAMITER.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3283) for the relief of John H. Hamiter.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John H. Hamiter, of Lafayette County, Ark., $3,590.47, the proceeds of the sale of fifty-three bales of cotton sold by the Government in 1865 and placed in the Treasury of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MOORES CREEK BATTLEFIELD MONUMENT, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5288) appropriating $5,000 to inclose and beautify the monument on the Moores Creek battlefield, North Carolina.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAVING FLORIDA AVENUE, IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3482) to provide for the paving of a portion of Florida avenue between P and Q streets NW., city of Washington, D. C.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments, in line 7, before the word "dollars," to strike out "two hundred and fifty;" in line 9, after the word "appropriated," to insert "one half;" and in line 10, after the words "District of Columbia," to insert "and the other half out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That that portion of Florida avenue between P and Q streets NW., city of Washington, contiguous to Twenty-second street and north of the south line of lot 24, block 3, of Kalorama Heights addition to the city of Washington, be paved; and the sum of $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, one half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the other half out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to provide the necessary funds for the costs and expenses of such paving.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TUGALOO RIVER TOLL BRIDGE.

Mr. CLAY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16140) to authorize the maintaining and operating for toll an existing structure across Tugaloo River, known as "Knox's Bridge," at a point where said river is the boundary between the States of South Carolina and Georgia.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GRANT OF LANDS TO OREGON FOR FISH HATCHERY.

Mr. FULTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4487) granting to the State of Oregon certain lands to be used by it for the purpose of maintaining and operating thereon a fish hatchery.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to grant to the State of Oregon all that portion of that certain island situated in Snake River and commonly known as "Morton Island," which, when the public surveys shall have been extended so as to include the same, shall be within the boundaries of the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 14 and the south half of the south half of section 15, in township 18 south, of range 47 east of the Willamette meridian, in the State of Oregon, for the use of said State in maintaining and operating thereon a fish hatchery, etc.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BUILDING LINES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 59) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to establish building lines.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to establish building lines on streets or parts of streets less than 90 feet wide, in the District of Columbia, upon the presentation to them of a plat of the street or part of street upon which such action is desired showing the lots and the names of the record owners thereof and accompanied by a petition of the owners of more than one-half of the real estate shown on the plat requesting that building lines be established, or when the Commissioners deem that the public interests require that such building lines be established; but no such building line shall be established on any part of street less than one block in length.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill providing for the establishment of a uniform building line on streets in the District of Columbia less than 90 feet in width."

ENTRY OF AGRICULTURAL LANDS WITHIN FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5222) to provide for the entry of agricultural lands within forest reserves.

Mr. LODGE. That is a pretty important bill, which will lead to a good deal of discussion. I think it had better not be taken up at this time. There is a conference report awaiting the consideration of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will lie over without prejudice.

CAPT. SYDNEY LAYLAND.

Mr. KEAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2996) to reimburse Capt. Sydney Layland for sums paid by him while master of the United States transport Mobile in July and August, 1898.

Mr. CLAPP. I shall not object to the consideration of the bill of the Senator from New Jersey; but, after that is disposed of, I shall have to object to the consideration of other bills. It is now past 1 o'clock.

Mr. KEAN. This is a very short bill, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota, and will take but a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Jersey for the present consideration of the bill named by him?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $119.11 to reimburse Capt. Sydney Layland for amounts paid by him as master of the Army transport Mobile to soldiers of the Sixteenth Pennsylvania Volunteers for services as firemen on the United States transport Mobile in July and August, 1898.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

J. DE L. LAFITTE.

Mr. FOSTER and Mr. McCREARY addressed the Chair.

Mr. CLAPP. I understand there are two Senators who are anxious to ask for the present consideration of bills in which they are interested. I will yield to those Senators, but if it can stop with that, I shall be very glad.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. CLAPP. I yield.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1221) for the relief of J. de L. Lafitte.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of War to cause to be investigated and examined the circumstances of an embezzlement of quartermaster funds on board the United States Army transport Logan, discovered while Jacques de L. Lafitte, captain, quartermaster, Unietd States Army, was serving as transport quartermaster, amounting to $2,923.44; and if upon such examination and investigation he shall be satisfied that said Lafitte exercised due diligence and care, under the circumstances existing there at the time, in view of his physical disability, and had no personal knowledge that such embezzlement or embezzlements were occurring, and exercised due diligence in ferreting out and disclosing same, then he is authorized and directed to release and discharge Lafitte from any further liability for the sum of $2,923.44, and to refund and pay back to him whatever sums may have been withheld and deducted from his pay.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY A. BRONAUGH.

Mr. McCREARY. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 1223) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Bronaugh.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary E. Bronaugh, widow of William V. Bronaugh, late lieutenant-commander, United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. CLAPP. I now call up the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5976) to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report is before the Senate; and the question is on agreeing to it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I reluctantly ask the Senate to reject this report, and I will briefly give the reasons for my action.

The last time this matter was before the Senate there was a disagreement on the amendment to which I object, and it was, therefore, a matter of difference between the Senate and the House. It was alluded to in the debate, and objection was made to the Senate amendment to which the House had not agreed, but which was modified and a substitute presented. In that discussion facts were brought out that I will read presently, but the point that concerns me most is that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] in charge of the bill having been notified that Senators objected to the amendment, said: "Of course that will go out." I spoke to him privately on the matter, and he said, "That will go out. I will attend to that."

So I left the Chamber. I had intended to ask the Senate to recede from its amendment and to leave the House provision, and I have no doubt the Senate would have agreed to it, because the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] was also interested in this matter and had indicated his desire to speak on it, and when the report was withdrawn the last thing said about it was that the Senator from Wisconsin had indicated his purpose to talk about it.

The facts are simply these, Mr. President: In the original bill as it came from the House there was a provision which I will read. It is in section 9:

SEC. 9. That upon dissolution of the several tribal governments of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes all records and files of said tribes shall, under direction of the Secretary of the Interior, be removed and deposited with such Government officer or officers as he may designate, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary respecting the removal, deposit, preservation, and inspection of such records. If any officer or member of any of said tribes, or other person having any of such records or files in his possession, fail or refuse to deliver in the manner directed by the Secretary of the Interior, or shall willfully mutilate or destroy any part thereof, such person shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Upon dissolution of said tribal governments, all causes then pending in any tribal court shall be transferred to the United States courts in Indian Territory by filing the papers therein with the clerk of the proper district, after which such causes shall proceed to final determination as if originally instituted in said United States court.

The Senate struck out this provision as it came from the House, and inserted the following:

The disbursements, in the sum of $186,000, to and on account of the loyal Seminole Indians, by James E. Jenkins, special agent appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and by A. J. Brown as administrator de bonis non, under an act of Congress approved May 31, 1900, appropriating said sum, be, and the same are hereby, ratified and confirmed: Provided, That this shall not prevent any individual from bringing suit in his own behalf to recover any sum really due him.

You will see that the Senate amendment really makes no allusion whatever, or if at all only in the most meager way, to the part of the bill stricken out. It is entirely new matter.

The explanation of it is that this sum of $186,000 appropriated by Congress to be paid to the Seminole Indians by Jenkins, as agent, and Brown, as administrator, was so badly managed that this money was—well, the truth of the charge is that the Indians were defrauded, or some of them at least; that Brown, the administrator, did not settle honestly with the Indians; that lots of the money stuck to his fingers—was misappropriated or stolen.

The Secretary of the Interior, having had these charges brought to his attention by his officials—his inspectors—employed a lawyer to prosecute Brown in the courts for malfeasance in office or to sue him for the sums which he had misapplied.

The Department of the Government charged with superintending and protecting the Indians, under our guardianship, as they are, has thought that there was sufficient justice in these contentions to employ a lawyer to institute suits. Those suits are now pending in the Federal court, and the Senate comes to the rescue of this man, who has been charged with dishonesty or maladministration or something—the Senate steps to the front, kicks the cases out of court, ratifies or validates the acts of this man who was administrator, and relieves him of all responsibility, and leaves him in possession of the money he has stolen; and the only consolation anyone has is the proviso:

Provided, That this shall not prevent any individual from bringing suit in his own behalf to recover any sum really due him.

This great Government has settled with these Indians by appropriating the money, and when the agent selected by it to make the settlement is sued by the Government Congress steps forward and enacts into law a provision that all the acts of this man shall be ratified and validated. I know nothing about this. I would not have taken two minutes' time or feel any interest in it but for the fact that I received a letter from a gentleman, who is reliable, informing me of these suits, saying that Brown was being sued by the Government itself, and that the Government had employed a lawyer to prosecute those suits to try to recover the money for these Indian children. This man writes to me about this matter, and it seems to be an outrage that the Government agent shall be permitted to steal the property of these Indian orphans and then the Government shall turn in and say, "Go scot-free; it is all right; we will not prosecute you or allow anybody else to, but we will allow these poor children to hire a lawyer, if they can get one, to take up the cases individually and sue Mr. Brown if the Indian children see fit." That is the whole sum and substance of the situation.

If the Senator from Minnesota had not promised me that the provision would go out, if he had not promised the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senate itself that it would go out, I would not have called attention to it. But the conference report comes back, and, strange to say, the House, which knew nothing about this originally, took no cognizance of it in the original bill, has now become enlightened by some new influence, and insists that the Senate amendment, as originally agreed to here, shall stay in the bill, against the protest of the Senate conferees, I understand.

I do not know what the parliamentary status is. It was originally a Senate amendment. It was not agreed to the last time, without itself being amended by the House, but now the House accepts the Senate amendment, and it is no longer a matter of dispute between the two bodies. I would have moved—and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], whose parliamentary knowledge no one will dispute, told me it could be done—that the Senate recede from its amendment when the report was here last. It is simply a matter of a few Indian orphans whose property has been stolen by an agent of the Government. At least that is the charge. He may be entirely innocent; I do not know, and he may be able to prove himself innocent.

But as the courts have the matter in hand and the cases are being prosecuted by the Government to protect the Indians, it seems to me a very queer and extraordinary proceeding that Congress should step in to protect this rich fellow against these Indian orphans. That is the reason why I ask the Senate to reject the report and let the conferees understand that the Senate no longer wants this amendment to stay in. What may be the parliamentary status I can not tell. It is a little more knotty than I am able now to unravel. It would be easy enough if the House had not at the second conference—the last conference—agreed to the Senate amendment, because it would still be in dispute. But as the House has agreed to the Senate amendment, and the Senator who promised to take it out has not done it, the Senate must determine what it will do about it.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] says he does not know anything about this item, and he has made that perfectly plain. So I will not dispute that portion of his argument.

I am not going into a detailed explanation. I leave that to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. But I wish to say a word in behalf of the chairman of the conference committee. I was sitting here, and so was the other conferee, when the chairman said he would withdraw this item from the bill. I looked around the Chamber for the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG], who is fairly familiar with the subject, and not seeing him I supposed the chairman had some arrangement with him by which it should go out. At any rate, when we came into conference the chairman insisted on complying with the promise made in the Senate, and the conferees of the Senate were willing to and did stand by the chairman in asking that it be withdrawn. However, the House conferees would not consent to its being withdrawn. They were very insistent, and said we had no right to withdraw it. They insisted that it was a Senate amendment which they had agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. With an amendment.

Mr. DUBOIS. No.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; in that conference they had agreed to an amendment to the Senate amendment. I have got it right here. I can read it to you.

Mr. CLAPP. That is probably true, but where the House conferees held the situation was that it was in their power to recede from the disagreement of the House to the Senate amendment, while it was not in our power as a matter of parliamentary practice or law to withdraw a Senate amendment against their protest. When the House conferees acquiesced in the amendment of the Senate striking out the House provision, and they had a right to do that, it left only the Senate provision, which they could accept, and that ended it. That is the difficulty with the situation, and it would be the difficulty again if we went back.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I want to make it perfectly plain that the chairman did all he could to carry out his promise; and in his contention the other conferees stood with him. The chairman—and I violate no confidence in saying it—went so far as to say to the House conferees, "We will put this item on the Indian appropriation bill, so that it can be fought out in the Senate and discussed there." He made every effort to comply with the promise that he made to the Senator from South Carolina on the floor. I think the item ought to stay in the bill. I think the Senate will understand that it should stay in the bill when they are made familiar with the facts as the conferees and the Committee on Indian Affairs are familiar with them.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish the Senator would give us the facts.

Mr. DUBOIS. The Senator from Colorado will give you the facts. As I stated, I simply wanted to——

Mr. TILLMAN. Is there anything the Senator has in the way of evidence, or is it simply the statement of some man?

Mr. DUBOIS. The Senator from Colorado will make a statement, and he is usually correct.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator from South Carolina if he has any evidence?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have a letter from a gentleman.

Mr. TELLER. That is all he has.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have this fact, if the Senator will permit me: The Secretary of the Interior has hired a lawyer to prosecute this administrator who was empowered by act of Congress to pay this money; and it is a blow in the face of the Secretary to take from his hands an administration of this trust fund and say to him, "You had no right to employ this lawyer. We are going to settle this thing by act of Congress and take it out of your power to compel restitution in the courts." That is all I say. That is all the evidence I have.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator has not any evidence of that kind, because the facts are not as he states them.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well——

Mr. TELLER. He supposes so; but they are not facts.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well; that is all I stated.

Mr. TELLER. There has been a lawyer employed.

Mr. TILLMAN. Who employed him?

Mr. TELLER. I suppose the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. TILLMAN. Has a lawyer been employed or not?

Mr. TELLER. I do not know anything about that. I know that no suit is being brought in the name of the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. No. It is in the name of these children.

Mr. TELLER. These are the facts in this case. The Committee on Indian Affairs had the matter before it and considered it. I will go back to the beginning.

When the civil war broke out a part of the Seminole Indians, who were then under treaty with the United States, went into the rebellion—joined the Confederacy. Another part of them joined the Union forces, and were organized into a regiment. I will not say there were quite enough for a full regiment on our side. They were in service in Kansas and in other sections of the country. During the war their stock was taken, their fences were burned up or torn down, their buildings were destroyed. When the war was over they made a claim against the Government, not as a tribe, but as individual sufferers at the hands of the Confederate forces, both Indian and white, and insisted that they were entitled to compensation from the Government for the losses they had sustained. They came here year after year presenting that claim. I believe several committees reported it favorably. At least I know there was a strong feeling that they ought to be paid, but Congress never enacted a law for the payment of the claim.

Later, a few years ago, they went to a gentleman who had held a commission in a Kansas regiment, and under whom these people had served during the war, and asked him to take up this case, which he did, with another party. They came here day after day until they finally got a bill through and got an appropriation for something a little less than a hundred and eighty-odd thousand dollars. In the meantime these Indians, wards of ours, had ceased to be wards of the Government. They had become citizens of the United States, and as such they were prosecuting their claim against the Government. There were something like 230 or 240 or 250 of them who had suffered, and they organized a committee to make a contract with these parties to prosecute the case. Those parties came here and prosecuted it, as I say, and got an appropriation. The Indians were citizens when they made the contract. They are citizens now—not wards of this Government.

I undertake to say there is not any proof that Mr. Brown or the officer of the Government, Mr. Jenkins, who went down there, ever stole or misappropriated any of that money.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator from Colorado think it is better, more fitting, more appropriate, that on ex parte statements the Senate shall settle this question by enacting a provision that the transactions of Brown with the Indians shall be validated, or that the court, right on the ground, where the witnesses are accessible, shall determine it after a hearing? The Secretary of the Interior has thought it of sufficient importance
